Let me reinforce the point. Fast jets have to sit at suitable bases that are limited in number. It could take 20 to 30 minutes for them to get into the air and to reach the target, which they cannot see, given the speed they fly at, so they have to rely on a forward air controller. Obviously, they do not stay long over the conflict area. By way of contrast, a prop aircraft can loiter overhead giving surveillance cover, because it can see exactly what is happening on the ground. A prop aircraft can attack accurately within a minute or two and give genuine air cover. What an advantage that would have been over these last few years.

Equally, reconnaissance operations should have their own aircraft, such as the Pilatus Porter PC-6, which can operate with the patrol being able to land and take off within very short distances indeed, acting as an evacuation carrier and a general supply vehicle. These aircraft should be operated by other ranks within the Army, and we should learn the lessons from other successful counter-insurgency forces such as the Rhodesians, whom I have referred to in the past and who were extremely successful.

There is a constant shortage of helicopters, yet the Merlin is a very good, if extremely expensive, helicopter. The RAF's Mk 3 Merlins cost £19 million each, and the six Danish ones cost £29.3 million each and £34,000 an hour to run. I repeat that figure of £34,000 an hour to run to my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), who, judging by his expression, slightly doubted or queried what I said.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): Not doubted, but queried.

Ann Winterton: Often, the attitude seems to be that the UK needs the best to cover every eventuality, and therefore the nation will cough up the funds for that. Once again, however, that is exactly the attitude to which Robert Gates referred and it is one of the reasons why we are so short of helicopters. Similarly, 12 Type 45 destroyers were ordered but only six are to be delivered, which is a direct consequence of high costs. The military are not living in the real world if they believe that they can have anything at any price, and that is one of the reasons why the UK is short of what it actually needs.

According to the Ministry of Defence, in February the serviceability of the Mk 3 Merlin was 50 per cent. against a target of 70 per cent., which was only beaten by the Navy Mk 1, the serviceability of which was 41 per cent. Similarly, the serviceability of the Sea King Mk 4/6 Navy version was 45 per cent. against a target of 65 per cent. I repeat: platforms are needed across the board for counter-insurgency that are simple, robust and will last in the long term. Yes, they must also carry the latest technology, but at the same time they must be as simple as possible to maintain. It is not practical to have overly complicated, highly technical platforms that require massive back-up to remain operational and are unsuitable for training the host nation's forces. I sometimes think that the military have been seduced by the European Union agenda and the possibility of having gleaming, highly technical toys with which to fight a conventional all-out war.

I have not mentioned the Navy, Mr. Olner, because it is not a subject about which I have particular knowledge.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Afghanistan is a bit outside the reach of the Navy.

Ann Winterton: Yes, the Navy is outside Afghanistan, but I believe that it is worth mentioning en passant.

One must ask why we need the two aircraft carriers, including the accompanying aircraft, which will soak up so much of the budget. The only conclusion that I can arrive at is that they will pack a considerable punch and can act as a deterrent to prevent conflicts from breaking out and escalating into major warfare. However, the price seems to be very high in the reduction in the number of frigates and destroyers, and thereby in the UK's ability to have a Navy presence around the world to guard our shipping routes. Should we not also be looking at the other end of the spectrum and procuring more inshore patrol craft?

I propose to finish by discussing two important subjects: finance and the benefit to the nation of a sound defence policy. Whichever party wins the next general election, some very large financial commitments have been made by this Government that will come into effect during the period from 2010 to 2015. If the military believe that they will get more money out of a Conservative Government, I think that they are deluding themselves. That extra money is not likely to be forthcoming, bearing it in mind that the country will probably be broke by then. I hasten to add that I speak, of course, as a Back Bencher and there may be those who disagree. However, I have always believed that it is best to face up to the worst-case scenario in order to plan for the future.

The mantra that our armed forces are underfunded is often repeated—indeed, there is some truth in it—but how the money for our forces is spent also needs to be challenged and I believe that it is a pertinent issue. I have pointed out in previous debates that the wastage in the defence budget has been enormous, mainly due to unclear or ulterior motives and objectives.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I have certainly been following closely what the hon. Lady has been saying. She seems to be making an important technical point about a lot of the equipment, and she is right to say that we should cut our cloth according to our means. Does she not think that an important feedback is that foreign policy should also be aware of the capability of our defence policy? If that were the case, we would not have walked away from Afghanistan too soon and moved on to Iraq without finishing the job that was to be done in Afghanistan, and without focusing our resources to see through the task that we had gone there to do.

Ann Winterton: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point. Of course foreign policy and defence policy must be intertwined at some stage; indeed, it is absolutely essential for the benefit of this country and for our ability to engage elsewhere in the world. I would add that it is very sad that it is the UK, the Canadians and others, including the Americans, who seem to play the major role in Afghanistan, while so many other countries within the European Union, for various reasons of their own, do not pull their weight. The time is fast coming when that balance will need to be changed.

If, as I believe is happening, we are funding "next war-itis", present operations will either be starved of cash or denied the most suitable platforms in sufficient quantities at the time when they are most needed. I believe that the MOD is doing its best to learn from recent hard lessons, but it has not been much helped by certain factions within the military.

We rely on our armed services for the defence of the nation and of the people of the UK, whom we as MPs have the honour and responsibility to represent in Parliament. In my view, it is highly unlikely that any force will directly attack our shores; instead, the threat to us now is far more subtle and difficult to counter. The enemy is within and around us, and we cannot always differentiate between friend and foe. As the Paras have tragically experienced recently, terrorism is the greatest evil and we have to be better prepared to defeat it, not least because the United Kingdom needs a stable world for trade, which is the lifeblood of our economic survival.

[Ann Winterton]

I share the belief of Robert Gates that the top military and political priority should be the success of COIN, or counter-insurgency, operations, to ensure that the breeding grounds of instability in the world, which are the greatest danger to our people, are neutralised. It is within that sector that British forces could excel and, indeed, are excelling against the odds. It is up to the military to explain where their priorities will lie in future, from a basis of the Government of the day giving clear directional leadership.

The United Kingdom is no longer a global power and, unlike the Americans, we cannot afford two armies—one for counter-insurgency and the other for conventional warfare involving large-scale manoeuvres. I believe that we should concentrate on undertaking counter-insurgency and similar operations exceptionally well, rather than diluting our efforts and resources. We should face facts and recognise that the United Kingdom can no longer fulfil all its aspirations as far as defence is concerned, and that stretched resources and manpower will limit what we can achieve in the future.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. Two Members are standing to speak. I advise Members that I intend to start the winding-up speeches at 11.55, to give the two Opposition spokesmen 10 minutes each and the Minister 15 minutes. Could Members govern their speeches by that?

11.30 am

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): It is a pleasure to serve in a second debate this morning under your chairmanship, Mr. Olner.

I am always wary of politicians becoming armchair generals. It is clear that the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) sits at home at night going through statistics and, obviously, gaining a vast knowledge about various pieces of kit and then moving them around some fancy battlefield on her kitchen table. From my experience of visiting Iraq five times and Afghanistan on three occasions, I do not think that what she said is realistic or reflects what is happening on the ground.

We need to look at what has happened during the past 20 years, or even the past seven years. The hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) and I were elected in June 2001. I do not think that most people at that time would have foreseen that, seven years later, Britain would be in both Afghanistan and Iraq. There has been rapid change. Of course, I agree with the hon. Lady in one respect: we have to get our military and the Ministry of Defence moving at a quicker tempo.

Change will come. We have certainly seen it in the vehicle types used in Iraq and Afghanistan, where we have moved away from the lightly armoured vehicles used in the early days. We have had to respond to counter-insurgency improvised explosive devices and enemies that—let us be honest—are not stupid or foolish. They are developing not just tactics to attack our forces but technology. We should not think that, just because people live in the caves of Tora Bora, they are not also using the latest technologies and techniques of counter-insurgency. An aspect to which we do not pay enough attention—the hon. Lady mentioned this—is the way in which our enemies use the media and the internet to get their message across.

The hon. Lady is right about some of the equipment failures in the early days. There were questions to be asked, but we have responded to what was happening. As she and the Minister know, I am not afraid to criticise the MOD when it gets things wrong. In the past few years, vehicles such as the Mastiff and other urgent operational requirements have been put into theatre quickly, and lessons could be learned from that for other procurement processes. When we actually need pieces of kit, we can get them into the field quickly—industry is up to the challenge—so why can we not do it on other occasions?

On the future rapid effect system, the hon. Lady and I are the two anoraks in Parliament. We have both been asking questions about the process. Frankly, it is a farce of a programme. It has gone on far too long, and it has been chopped and changed. As the hon. Lady knows, I have asked several questions, as she has, about FRES. The MOD may wonder why those two anoraks are asking all those questions, but, to be honest, there are issues not just about delivering kit to our armed forces but about value for money, which she rightly raised.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me about this. When looking at FRES, the Defence Committee learned that the military could not make up their minds about their requirements. They continuously changed their minds, and pressure was created because nobody had a clear indication of what was actually needed. The Defence Committee should take some of the credit for getting the military to look differently at how they were assessing their requirements.

Mr. Jones: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who serves on the Defence Committee with me. The hon. Member for Congleton mentioned in her speech something that we should do. There is a tendency for the Army and others to hide behind politicians, but the hon. Gentleman is correct that, in respect of some decisions, they are not clear about their requirements. Things get changed. Alongside that, there is Abbey Wood, which, frankly, grows ever more and employs more and more people to evaluate things down to the finest point possible.

Patrick Mercer: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely good point. He knows my background. I cannot help but feel that regular soldiers, professional officers and so on are sometimes far too close to the problem, and that things become more obscure the more knowledgeable one is. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is up to Ministers to give the firm smack of leadership and insert the toe of their boot into regular Army, Navy and Air Force officers where they do not like having boots inserted? Make them do their job, and make sure that taxpayers' money is properly spent and that MOD uniformed officers and civil servants are not able to slope their shoulders and avoid responsibility. Ministers must start making them do their job correctly.

Mr. Jones: I agree, but I have to tell the hon. Gentleman—he knows that I have a great deal of affection for him—that we cannot then have his Front-Bench team attacking Labour Ministers for not understanding the military, or somehow not being in tune with the military ethos. There is a military ethos, and there is expertise, which we have to take on board and listen to, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman that sometimes we also have to turn around and say that tough decisions need to be taken.

What the hon. Member for Congleton said about the defence budget was very interesting. I am one who would argue for more money to be spent on defence, and I am sure that she would as well, but whether we like it or not, we cannot take funds from the budgets of the entire Government—defence competes with other things. I sometimes think that some of the present debate about more money for the military is taking place in a vacuum, in that people are not realising that money would be taken from the health service and everywhere else. Would the public necessarily agree with that? Added to that, as the hon. Member for Newark rightly said, there will be criticism if the money is not well spent.

I should like to concentrate on FRES for a minute. We have now had the trials of truth. I am not quite clear where we are at with FRES. Last year, I went with the Chairman of the Defence Committee to the trials of truth for the three vehicles. The hon. Member for Congleton made a good point about one of the three vehicles, the Piranha V. There is no such vehicle; it does not exist. I get different views from industry and various people from the MOD and military whom I speak to, but I suspect that the reason why it is being promoted is that the Army wants it. That is its preference. We have had a coming together of various interests. Clearly, the Army wants the Piranha V, because it thinks that it is the best vehicle, which is fair enough. The Treasury is also behind it, knowing that it can take the bow wave of that procurement into the future.

This is where I come on to the Mastiff and other vehicles. The hon. Member for Congleton raised an important point. When I attended the trials of truth, I asked Lord Drayson, who was then the Minister, how the vehicles fit into the FRES requirement.

Mr. Hancock: They do not.

Mr. Jones: I am sorry, but they do; they are apparently now part of the FRES family of vehicles. The original concept was about wonderful all-singing, all-dancing vehicles, but I am not clear what it is now. That is why I tabled several questions last week specifically about weight and other things to which the hon. Lady referred.

I do not know why the MOD does not on occasion just put up its hands and say, "Look, the old days of FRES are finished. We have had to respond to counter-insurgency problems in Iraq and Afghanistan. We have procured urgent operational requirements and vehicles that are doing a great job." Why can we not say that we cannot afford the next phase of procurement for a few more years, or that perhaps we do not actually need it? That would be more honest than the nonsense that we keep getting.

There have been three or four in-service dates for FRES. I found the most recent information that I was given funny. I was told that the MOD does not give in-service dates, even though the answers to parliamentary questions that I received a few years ago actually gave such dates and even though General Jackson, when giving evidence to the Defence Committee, gave a date for FRES. I think that a little bit of honesty needs to be brought into this debate.

Ann Winterton: I agree. It would be much more honest to say that FRES is not what was intended, that it has come to an end and that we are going to change the name of the future requirements programme. Doing so would give a clear indication that the Government were going in the right direction.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. Although we are hearing from eminent hon. Members who are well established in respect of the armed forces and military equipment, for the sake of the record, can the hon. Gentleman say what FRES is?

Mr. Jones: It is the future rapid effect system, Mr. Olner. That is a good question. [Interruption.] Yes, it is a mystery.

I pay credit to urgent operational requirements, because although there has been a lot of criticism of kit, I think that the kit has been delivered now. I saw a Mastiff vehicle that had run over a mine in Basra last time that I was there and spoke to the lads that were inside it at the time. Clearly, it saved their lives. Not only is that vehicle repairable, but it is popular with the personnel using it. That is one solution.

In respect of counter-insurgency, commanders need a suite of different vehicles—sometimes the press do not quite grasp that—and some of those vehicles cannot be heavily armoured, because of the terrain that they are working in. If we are not careful, we will have a vehicle that is so heavily armoured that it will not be able to move. We must recognise that counter-insurgency warfare is a dangerous business.

In conclusion, the MOD has a good track record. I should like more urgent operational requirements, because that would provide better value for money and cut the long delays and the sense of frustration, not necessarily on the part of some of the generals, but on the part of some of the men and women who are being asked to do a difficult job in some difficult parts of the world.

11.42 am

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), whose friendship I hold in high esteem. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) on her success in securing this important debate. Most of all, I pay tribute to yet another three soldiers, from the 2nd Battalion the Parachute Regiment, who have been killed in action. It is fashionable in the Army for soldiers to denigrate each other's regiments and the Parachute Regiment was always a great rival of my former battalion. However, 2 Para has been hit hard throughout the years, from the massacres at Warrenpoint in 1979, right through to these three latest deaths. I pay tribute to that hard-fighting and hard-hit battalion.

[Patrick Mercer]

Hon. Members' contributions have been fascinating. My hon. Friend made some good points and the hon. Gentleman retorted well. I shall concentrate my remarks on what Ministers do. I hope that, if and when the Conservative party gets into power, it will take on board the many good points of the current crop of Ministers, including how they handle themselves, and I hope that we will put further pressure on the senior officers and senior civil servants in the Ministry of Defence to make our armed forces more effective.

I am not making a party political point. I am saying that many of the senior thought-formers inside the MOD do not have a wartime mentality and do not understand the fact that, rightly or wrongly, we have chosen to go to war on two fronts, where we are taking and inflicting serious casualties and doing great work for democracy, freedom and for the subject peoples of at least two nations, but for which we are horribly under-resourced and in respect of which the thinking is wrong.

I should like to illustrate my remarks further. Hon. Members may not be aware that I am probably the world's greatest living bore on the Crimean campaign, so much of which is applicable today. For instance, I refer hon. Members to a cartoon in The Illustrated London News, shortly after the battle of Inkerman in November 1854, in which a tattered private soldier of the line is talking to a threadbare guardsman. The guardsman is saying to the linesman, in respect of Sevastopol and Inkerman,

"Well, Jack... We're to have a medal", and the private soldier from the line says,

"That's very kind. Maybe one of these days we'll have a coat to stick it on."

We have all heard about the kit nonsense in the Crimea: the clothing was not warm enough, left boots turned up—although there is a sensible explanation for that—bayonets broke and some regiments went to war with smooth-bore weapons rather than rifles, and so on. Surely, the lessons of history are there.

Surely, when my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) and I, with the hon. Members for North Durham and for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), visited exercise Saif Sareea with the Defence Committee in 2001, we knew that some thoughtful individual in the Ministry of Defence was saying, "Let us have a dress rehearsal for what is about to happen. We don't know what is about to happen, but we know these are going to be some of the most seminal, thought-forming experiences for the next decade or so." It was great that we had Saif Sareea and great that the armed forces understood that operations in hot climates would occur and that they would probably be of a counter-insurgency nature. But why did we not learn the lessons? Why are the lessons not being applied?

In my last job in the Army, as a full colonel in the Army Training and Recruiting Agency, I asked in 1999, "What are the war plans for the expansion either of specialist trades inside the recruiting and training cycle or for wholesale recruiting?" The answer came back: "We are never going to fight that sort of war again. Indeed, it is unlikely that we are going to fight wars." The thinking then was not properly formed, and we are suffering from that lack of understanding of warfare today.

I was flattered to be invited to visit RAF Waddington last week, but I was surprised that the seventh aircraft of the Sentry programme, a strategic piece of equipment applicable to conventional warfare through to counter-insurgency warfare—I do not patronise the Minister; I know that he understands that—which was damaged in a storm several months ago was not operational. That is to do with how the contracted repair, which is complex, has been organised. But surely this is battle-winning and war-winning strategic equipment. A little extra resource for that specific piece of equipment will get it flying again quickly. That is important.

I can go on talking about equipment disasters, such as Bowman. I can talk to the Minister about the difficulties of equipment, such as FRES. As long ago as when I was a young infantry officer, we were asking for 2-inch mortars and rifle-launched grenades, saying, "Whenever the next war comes upon us, we will need the equipment that our fathers and grandfathers used in Flanders and Anzio. It is the same kit; we need it." Yet we did not have it. Now, six or seven years after the start of the conflicts that we are talking about, that kit is in service. I can produce a litany of nonsense in that vein.

When I visited my old battalion, the 1st Battalion the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters Regiment, which has now, for reasons best known to the Minister, been scrapped—

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Merged.

Patrick Mercer: It was scrapped.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot and I visited them in Helmand, where they took nine men dead and 37 injured, they told us, "The kit's good. It's not perfect, but it's good. Compared with what we had the last time we were in Afghanistan and compared with what we had when we were in Bosnia, this kit is really excellent." Yes, there are anomalies and problems, but we are realistic about such things. For instance, in relation to what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton, those soldiers told us that the WIMK vehicle, the converted armoured Land Rover, was not perfect, but, by golly, they needed vehicles that they felt that they could get on and off quickly. While there were certainly more heavily armoured vehicles in the pipeline, as my hon. Friend pointed out, the vehicle mix was important, and commanders had to be flexible. Yes, they pointed out that the armour plates were inadequate. Yes, there was a lot of find and fix going on by the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, but they accepted that because they were professional soldiers. The bottom line was that, although they had difficulties, which they understood, equipment was good on the whole and much better than it had been.

The Minister may be wondering why this Tory Back Bencher is being complimentary. Well, here it comes: the kit is all right, but there are not the men to use it. The single most important piece of kit is the man who carries the pike, the man who pushes the bayonet and the man who throws the hand grenade. They are men, because not many women are carrying out such trades.

The finest car may have the best petrol and the most elaborate paintwork, but if it does not have a driver, it is useless as a vehicle.

Our Army in particular, the Royal Air Force to a lesser extent and the Royal Navy are in a parlous state in terms of those who do the fighting, the killing and the dying. I shall illustrate that by referring to 16 Air Assault Brigade, which has just deployed into Helmand. I could talk about all its battalions, but I shall concentrate on two of its Scottish battalions that have deployed. The Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, 5 Scots, has a paper strength, give or take, of 700. Its actual strength or deployed strength is 500. It has been able to go into the field with only 500 of the 700 bayonets that it should be taking to the Taliban. If that is examined in more detail, only about 350 Argylls have gone on operations with 5 Scots, with the rest being made up of reinforcements from the Royal Highland Fusiliers, 2 Scots, and other Army battalions. Even more worryingly, there is a hideous bill for the long-term sick in that battalion. Not only is it under-recruited and undermanned, it is also carrying a large number of soldiers who simply cannot deploy because they are long-term sick.

[Mr. Greg Pope in the Chair]

Other problems are coming up. For example, on return from Helmand province recently, the 1st Battalion the Royal Anglian Regiment had routine medical checks, and it seems that about 280 soldiers from that battalion will not be able to deploy again, because of the damage to their hearing that they suffered during the serious fighting this time last year.

Worryingly, if one asks an official question about the size of the Army, the answer comes back that it is supposed to be, give or take, 103,000 men strong. In truth, it is only marginally under strength by about 5,000, so let us say that on paper it has 98,000 men. However, the Minister is well aware that only about 50,000 are able to deploy. The rest have problems with compassionate issues, are not qualified, are still in training or are sick. That is not good enough.

The Minister fully understands that manning is made up of a three-part equation. The first part is recruiting; the second part—I do not mean to be patronising—is retention during training; and the third part is retention during service. If we ask how recruiting is going, the answer is, "Not bad. It is going very well." If we then ask how many men are retained during training and we concentrate on combat arms and particularly the infantry, the Minister will find, if he does not know already, that between 35 and 40 per cent. of infantry recruits drop out during training. The next part of the equation is how many men—trained non-commissioned officers and senior private soldiers—are retained in service? I do not know the figures, but inability to retain trained personnel is a major problem.

Mr. Kevan Jones: If the Army is under the pressure that the hon. Gentleman is describing—the Defence Committee is compiling a report on retention and recruitment—and if we are looking not only for value for money, but to retain people, is it not time to review Army structure in the UK, so that we do not have a plethora of commands and soldiers carrying out activities that are not front-line commitments?

Patrick Mercer: I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman. I had dinner with a major-general the other day at his house in London. I had better not give his name. Two sergeants had been abstracted from a battalion on operations—one was a mortarman and the other belonged to the battalion's mechanical transport platoon—to serve food dressed in little red monkey jackets, while the battalion was on operations against an enemy abroad. That cannot be right.

I roundly condemn the future infantry structure, for all sorts of different reasons. The only parts of the organisation with the curious name of the Mercian Regiment that are fully manned and recruited are battalion headquarters and the headquarter companies—with the greatest respect, the non-combatant side and officers and senior non-commissioned officers carrying the rank, the pensions, the pay, and so on. The bayonet power of those three battalions amounts to only just one and a bit battalions. Lieutenant-colonels and below neatly and comfortably carry on along their career paths, while the fighting manpower is flexed between the three battalions, almost like rent-a-mob, and does not receive the necessary tour gaps, rest and recuperation, training and so on.

The Minister has heard me talk about the matter—I am sure that he is extremely bored with the way in which I do so—but the Ministry of Defence is in denial, and I do not believe that Ministers are being told the correct story by people in the Ministry. For example, I appreciate that recruiting is only part of the manning equation, but if it is so important, if Headquarters Recruiting Group's job is so crucial in getting the petrol into the Army engine and if a key player in that is the brigadier in charge of recruiting, why was he absent for eight months last year on a court martial? That really cannot be right. Such decisions are wrong, and I ask the Minister to dig beneath the surface of what he is being told by career-conscious and ambitious officers to find out what the truth is.

What used to be called the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters Regiment was 90 men over strength eight years ago when I left it; it is now almost 100 men under strength when conditions are easier than they were eight or nine years ago, the Army is in the public eye much more than then and the opportunities to recruit are better. The measure that is being discussed to relax recruiting boundaries will result in a free-for-all and to all intents and purposes the regimental system that we have had for 250 years will be finally stabbed to death. That is a serious error. If regiments have the word "Irish" in their name, they should be allowed to recruit in Ireland and to continue to take on Irish recruits. The 2nd Battalion the Mercian Regiment is now for ever forlornly stationed in Palace barracks, Holywood. Why on earth should it recruit Irishmen? That is what the Ministry of Defence is proposing, and if the Minister is not aware of that, I ask him to consider the matter in more detail. It is dangerous, insidious and a final blow to the regimental system.

I shall finish by saying that much of the kit has improved and that much of the detail that has gone wrong in the past is now much better, but above and beyond everything else, if we do not have the manpower to fight the wars that our Government and nation want to fight, it is not only unfair but immoral.

11.59 pm

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): First, on behalf of myself and my colleagues, I would like to give my condolences to the families of the three paratroopers. As hon. Members have said and as I am sure the Minister will repeat, all of our thoughts and prayers go to the families and friends of the three young men whose lives were cut short in such tragic circumstances while they were fighting on our behalf. We owe a big debt of gratitude to them and to the other 97 families who have been affected in similar ways by the fighting in Afghanistan. We also owe a debt of gratitude to those fighting in Iraq and those who have been injured and seen their lives change significantly. The hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) should be congratulated on initiating this debate and on providing an opportunity to speak up for those people. The families of many of those affected by the issue have made many criticisms about equipment and have complained to the Defence Committee in order to try to bring home to Parliament the need for equipment failures to be considered.

I was going to interrupt the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), but he spent so much time talking about bayonet power that I was nervous to do so because I believe he was quite handy with a bayonet at one time. He was at full flow and I did not think he would take kindly to being interrupted by someone reminding him to get on with it and give us a chance to have our say. Bayonet power aside, I found the hon. Gentleman's contribution extremely interesting. He is right: the biggest failure is not having the manpower—men and women; the most precious of all commodities—available to deliver what we expect from our armed forces. His figures need to be verified and the MOD needs to answer the points he made about an on-paper 700 strong battalion only being able to deploy 500 people, many of whom are from other units. More importantly, it is worrying that so many of a returning battalion are unfit for service in a similar circumstance in the future. If, for example, a third of the battalion is unavailable for combat because of sustained injuries, such as deafness, what does that do to the morale and effectiveness of the unit?

I have a great deal of time and affection for my colleague from the Defence Committee, the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones)—he smiles at that, but he knows that it is true. It is beyond me why he has never been looked at for further advancement, and I am sure many of his colleagues on the Defence Committee also share that view. He would make a useful contribution to dealing with this issue and would bring some straight thinking.

Mr. Kevan Jones: That's me doomed.

Mr. Hancock: No. He knows, as well as I do, that the Defence Committee has never shirked from its responsibility of taking on the military in relation to equipment. We do not have in-service dates now because the MOD learned through Eurofighter, which had more in-service dates than Frank Sinatra had retirement and farewell concerts, that it cannot do so because they fail to materialise. One has only to look at the Committee's most recent report on defence equipment for evidence of that. The report talks about the failure of in-service dates on nearly every project. In some instances, the in-service date has been shifted five or six times. Therefore, we do not now give in-service dates.

The hon. Member for Congleton spoke well about understanding what is needed when fighting an insurgency. I agree with her entirely. The suggestion that we will fight some sort of conventional war in the future is long past its sell-by date. I do not think we will be in that position. The lessons from Iraq one and two, and from our experiences in Afghanistan are vitally important to understanding where we go in the future. That is why the military have to be more realistic about what they expect a Government to deliver. I do not sympathise with Ministers, but I can understand the predicament they are in. They are challenged time and again with repeated requests for different things and have to prioritise matters that the military themselves fail to prioritise and be clear about.

Again, I commend the Defence Committee's report to hon. Members and to the whole House. Time and again, the report mentions the failure to have a clear perception of what is required and the fact that the spec of the equipment is continuously changed. There is also the issue of Abbey Wood and wanting to check the reliability of the design or structure of the product to the nth degree instead of looking at what is required and first of all seeing if it is available anywhere else in the world. There is a distinct reluctance on the part of the Ministry of Defence to look for something already tried and tested and take it off the shelf.

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: indicated dissent.

Mr. Hancock: The Minister shakes his head. The hon. Member for North Durham who spoke earlier said that there has been a change. That change has been a long time coming. In the past, predecessors of the Minister have repeatedly spoken to the Committee and the House and have flatly refused to look at the off-the-shelf option. Bowman, and Clansman before it, are classic examples of the Government not wanting to buy products that are available, even though they do what they want them to.

Mr. Ainsworth: I shake my head now in 2008. I cannot shake my head in 2002 or 1999. Cougar was bought off the shelf and up-armoured to Mastiff. When it is needed, that is what we do.

Mr. Hancock: I welcome the Minister's intervention. Of course, he cannot take responsibility for the past, but he shook his head too quickly because I was going to give the Government credit for the changes. Perhaps that is part of the problem.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Would the hon. Gentleman agree that although what the Minister says is correct, the default setting in the MOD means that even when something is bought off the shelf, an integrated project team still has to be put in place to look at how it has been evaluated. For example, the Minimi machine gun, which was purchased during early operations in Afghanistan, was welcomed, did a great job and everyone loved it. However, an evaluation was still set up afterwards.

Mr. Hancock: And the gun was nearly rejected. In the end, it had been dismantled and put together so many times it seemed the Government were trying to find fault with it. Because it had been used in operation we knew that it was the weapon required, yet every obstacle possible was put in the way of early deployment. Why? We do not know why.

I draw hon. Members' attention to an old issue that we face time and again. In last night's Evening Standard, there was a picture of five members of the Parachute Regiment on deployment in Helmand. It was interesting to look at their feet because no two of them have the same pair of boots and three of them have different webbing packs. Equipment is important. The hon. Member for Newark is correct: servicemen have seen a dramatic improvement in the provision of equipment. However, some issues still cause them concern and safety in vehicles is a classic problem. We have had the argument time and again about boots that do not work in the desert and I do not want to go over that. However, our service personnel still buy their own equipment because what they are issued with is not suitable for the conditions that they are in.

I would like to draw the attention of hon. Members to some of the things mentioned in today's debate pack. An issue that has not been mentioned is that of vehicles enabling the treatment of injury and the cases of victims who need to be transported and worked on by medics. Space is confined and facilities for proper medical vehicles are lacking.

There is much to be said on the matter. I realise that time is short and that hon. Members want to hear the Minister respond, so on behalf of my colleagues and as a result of my experience on the Defence Committee, I would like to say that there are improvements on the way that will have a great effect—for example, the Mastiff and other changes that have occurred in vehicles. However, I share the view that the flexibility of the command to have a series of vehicles and choices is vital. I also share the view of those hon. Members who have said that it is no good settling for just one correct option—one has only to see the consequences of not having such an approach to realise that. I also agree with the hon. Member for Congleton: we have to deal with our colleagues who have failed to share the burden—not in the European Union, but in NATO. This is a NATO issue, not an EU issue. If it cannot share the fighting and dying, I hope that at some stage it can at least share the equipment. The fact that we had to buy helicopters from the Danes is once again a clear example of co-operation just not existing.

12.9 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I am delighted to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Pope. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) in paying tribute to the members of 2 Para who have given their lives in the last few days. Those events demonstrate the commitment not only of that regiment, but of the British Army and the other two services.

It is very important that the people of this country understand that it is not only the British Army that is carrying out those acts of heroism in Iraq and Afghanistan; it is very much a tri-service commitment. I should like to remind hon. Members that it was a female Royal Air Force Merlin helicopter pilot who was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross. She was flying into a hail of enemy fire to rescue wounded soldiers. It needs to be put on the record that the Royal Air Force is giving huge, dedicated service, as is the Royal Navy, not so much at sea but certainly in the form of the Royal Marine Commandos, whose own tour in Helmand province was extremely distinguished.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton on securing the debate and managing to get the defence groupies together. I can assure her that if an hour and a half today is not sufficient time—clearly, it is not—we can reprise the exercise next week. I offer her an invitation to come to the defence procurement debate on the Floor of the House next Thursday—I have pointed out to my Whip that that happens to be ladies day at Ascot, to which I was already committed and from which I have had to withdraw.

Ann Winterton: Sadly, I must turn down the invitation to take part next Thursday, for the simple reason that I shall be sitting in the seat in which Mr. Pope is sitting this afternoon.

Mr. Howarth: I can say on behalf of us all that that will be our loss. We hope that my hon. Friend will be able to extract herself from the seat of power here and come to the other debate to make a contribution, for she has made a very significant contribution not only today but repeatedly in the important matter of providing the correct defence equipment for our armed forces as they experience constant change in the threat that they face and the tactics of the enemy. Our responsibility as Members of Parliament—clearly, it falls most heavily on the shoulders of the Minister—is to ensure that our armed forces have the best equipment that we can give them.

The essential burden of my hon. Friend's case was that we need more appropriate equipment, which needs to be better value for money than what is available at the moment. She also made the case about "next war-itis." If she had been a clergyman, she would have said, "I take my text from one Robert Gates," who made those remarks about the attitude of the military. I just warn her against being too zealous in going down the route of concentrating wholly and exclusively on the immediate, for we face a much more complex world now than that which we faced when the cold war was at its height and we could see exactly where the threat was coming from. The threat is now all around us. We know what the threat is from insurgents in Afghanistan and Iraq, but I would be very nervous about dismissing Mr. Putin's intentions in building up his armed forces. Although I agree with my hon. Friend that it is unlikely that our shores face attack in the foreseeable future, it would be a foolish politician who decided to take the gamble that we could safely ignore consideration of, for example, renewal of our nuclear deterrent or, indeed, some of our other capabilities that will not be required in the immediate future.

Ann Winterton: I was not suggesting that.

Mr. Howarth: Not entirely, but my hon. Friend was suggesting that "next war-itis" was an issue that we should be concerned about. She is right, but clearly we face a more complex world than we did before.

Let me turn to Afghanistan and Iraq. There will always be a trade-off between mobility and protection. General Johnny Holmes said to me that the light can go heavy, but the heavy cannot go light. That was quite a salutary lesson to learn and we can apply it in this case, but we do need to provide our troops with the maximum protection. I alerted the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid), when I returned from an armed forces parliamentary scheme visit to Iraq in 2005 that we were in grave danger of having completely inadequate equipment to deal with improvised explosive devices. He assured me that he was already on the case. My hon. Friend has been absolutely stalwart in arguing the case for the V-shaped hull. The recognition by the Ministry of Defence that that was needed was too slow. The Government's response was too slow, but my hon. Friend has been utterly consistent on that issue and has been proved right by virtue of what has been happening in theatre. We have all seen the Mastiff in operation and it is undoubtedly an excellent piece of kit.

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) and I enjoy a friendship across party barriers, but I think that he is right to say that commanders in the field require a range of options. My hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) and I were in the compound at Lashkar Gah when his former regiment returned. I can tell hon. Members that it was very interesting to see the huge respect with which those who had served under the leadership of my hon. Friend greeted their former commander when they saw that he was at Lashkar Gah to meet them.

However, the need to be mobile and able to leap off and on kit means that people cannot go around exclusively in Mastiff vehicles. The Jackal is an extremely exciting new development. My hon. Friend the Member for Congleton is right about the problem of protection on the Jackal and she is even more right about the problem of protection on the Pinzgauer Vector—the driver sits right over the wheel, and the wheel is the part of the machine that activates the IED. The Vector has a role to play, but not in a dangerous theatre such as that which we are discussing.

My hon. Friend did not refer to unmanned air vehicles, but that is an area in which much more needs to be done. UAVs are already playing a prominent role, but they could play a more prominent role. I think that my hon. Friend would say that rather than having the most expensive, most sophisticated UAVs, we should be considering cheaper options. In my constituency, QinetiQ is developing something called Zephyr, which is a UAV for very high altitudes. It looks like something from a balsa wood kit. It is operated using solar panels and is doing a fantastic job. It is still in research mode, but I hope that the Minister will tell us what is being done to harness UAVs to provide better reconnaissance and, for example, to be able to identify disturbed earth, because if we can identify disturbed earth, we can see where IEDs may be being laid.

My hon. Friend referred to lower-cost turboprop aircraft. I think that the Minister knows of my affection for the Pilatus PC-21. I would very much like to procure that superb aeroplane for the Royal Air Force one day—that is why I keep looking at the opinion polls with such enthusiasm. I shall be flying the aeroplane next month at the royal international air tattoo. My hon. Friend is on to something here: we need to consider more practical equipment. I will just give a warning, though. New kit such as that going into theatre requires defensive aid suites to be fitted and they do not come cheaply. We cannot just stick a Tucano or other turboprop aeroplane into theatre and say, "That's it." Quite a lot of amendment work has to go on. Essentially, what my hon. Friend is talking about is a brass, not a gold, solution, so I think she is right.

My hon. Friend mentioned helicopters. The Government have been caught napping on that issue. They cut the helicopter budget by £1.4 billion in 2004 and the result has been disastrous. We simply do not have enough helicopters. We have bought six Merlin helicopters from the Danes, but I understand that the floor of the helicopter is completely unserviceable for our use and will have to be subject to further adaptation. It is appalling that further action has not been taken to ensure that we have more helicopters. It is not as though this situation came on us suddenly, as a surprise; it has been obvious for a long time that we need more helicopters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newark is right about the shortage of manpower. He said that the armed forces, particularly the Army, were in a parlous state. I will just add to his other points that there is too much reliance on overseas recruits because we cannot recruit from the United Kingdom and therein lies a damaging prospect for the British Army. Representing Aldershot, I know that people are resigning because they cannot take the constant tempo of operations. Even if they can, their families cannot. That factor needs to be taken into account.

Time is limited, Mr. Pope, and we will be able to resume the debate next week, but I wish to make five brief observations. First, we require a defence review. It is essential that we have one, and that is what my party will be putting before the people at the next election. Secondly, we need flexible equipment that is capable of subsequent adaptation, depending upon changes in circumstances. Kit must be designed with the prospect of needing to adapt it. Thirdly, the system of urgent operational requirements works extremely well, but it does not dovetail into the main procurement programme. We should migrate the excellent swift decision-making process that applies to UORs into the main procurement programme. I believe that that is absolutely essential, and I am working on it now. Fourthly, the Government should tell us what they are doing about UAVs, because there is a life-saving capability. Fifthly, where are we on FRES? A number of hon. Members mentioned it; perhaps the Minister can tell us.

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton says that there will be no money at the time of the next election, when the Conservative party hopes to come to Government. I assure her that I am conscious of that fact. I am also conscious that a huge bow wave of commitments is building up in a wide range of areas. In particular, the British people are going to have to acknowledge our growing commitment to the war wounded. They are not yet visible to the health service; but they will become increasingly visible and will add hugely to the defence budget. That, I believe, is not fair; it should come out of another budget. However, that is for the shadow Chancellor to decide.

12.21 pm

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): I echo the comments of the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) and other Members in expressing my deepest sympathy for the families, comrades and friends of the three paratroopers who recently lost their lives in Helmand. Earlier this year, I saw for myself the dedication of those remarkable people and what they are achieving on behalf of the Afghan people. We need always to remind ourselves that those achievements come with great sacrifice—and, for those three individuals, the greatest sacrifice.

The hon. Member for Congleton was right to highlight the fact that we have to live within the reality of finite resources. I am enormously pleased to see her toeing the party line and expressing the same view as her leader, who said that a Conservative Government would not increase defence spending. If only the Front Bench defence team would spit that out. Despite the fact that the leader has said it, and the Back Benchers recognise it as a fact—as the reality—the Front Bench continue to pretend that the situation is something else. However, I do not agree with the hon. Lady's conclusions. Effectively, she said that we ought to equip our armed forces to conduct counter-insurgency operations, neglecting to some degree all other types of conflict.

Ann Winterton: I did not say that.

Mr. Ainsworth: That is the way that the hon. Lady came across. In my view, that would be dangerous; it would undermine the country's ability to meet the security challenges that we may face in a rapidly changing and unpredictable world. That is to misunderstand the nature of the current operations and the way in which conflicts are likely to evolve.

Secretary Gates, who was quoted by the hon. Lady, said in a speech to the Heritage Foundation that defence procurement was a matter of balancing risk:

"today's demands versus tomorrow's contingencies".

We cannot allow the problems of today to dictate entirely how we equip and train our troops, just as we cannot neglect today's operations and focus on hypothetical future threats. That is what Secretary Gates called "next war-itis".

Our priority is and will be to ensure that our forces are properly equipped for current operations. However, a balanced force is a key national strategic asset that we would give up at our peril. We live in an uncertain world. We all remember the siren calls of the pundits who declared the end of history and were eager to push for the realisation of the peace dividend at the end of the cold war; those calls were hard to resist, but they were proved tragically premature. Since then, international terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the challenges posed by failed and failing states have emerged as threats to our security. They will continue to remain a challenge. Emerging trends such as climate change, competition for resources, geopolitical change and the proliferation of weapons technology will increase the uncertainty. A balanced force, mixing a range of capabilities will stand us in the best stead to deal with the unpredictability of future security challenges.

Some combinations of those threats are not only plausible but have had catastrophic effects on our security. In recent times, we have been involved in military operations with no counter-insurgency element—for instance, in the Falklands and the first Gulf war. No matter what people thought of the decision to invade Iraq, in Operation Telic, we could not have done so with Mastiff and Ridgeback vehicles. We could not have crossed the Al-Faw peninsula in that sort of vehicle. Yes, we could have gone up the road to Nazaria, but that was not the reality of the situation. We were recently faced with the need for an existing army and air force capability on behalf of the Iraqis; as recently as five years ago, we had to be able and equipped to face that threat as well as counter-insurgency.

Ann Winterton rose—

Mr. Ainsworth: If the hon. Lady is burning to have a go at me, I shall give way.

Ann Winterton: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. What he suggests is a parody of what I said. He is right to say that we have not been engaged in counter-insurgency for a number of years. We were very good at it at one time, but virtually every serving officer—anyone now serving in the armed services—has no direct experience of it. There is one exception: Jock Stirrup. I was saying that we do not have a balance when providing for our troops at present, and we have to over-egg the pudding to get over any kind of story. Not only do we not have balance, but we have forgotten some of the lessons that were hard-learned a long time ago.

Mr. Ainsworth: I know that the hon. Lady has given a lot of thought to the matter, but her basic argument was that there was a complete lack of balance; she said that we had 463 vehicles that were effectively useful in the circumstances and she wrote off 2,000. The hon. Lady chose to draw a line in order to make her case, but Jackal is on the other side of that line. That vehicle was purchased for Afghan counter-insurgency operations. We cannot put people only in heavy armoured vehicles; we also need light recce vehicles that are capable of getting around and that give vision and flexibility. The Jackal was produced with that in mind.

The hon. Lady assumed when drawing that line that FRES will not be configured for deflection of blast, but it will be. I do not know whether it will have a lower profile but the same manoeuvrability as Mastiff, but it will have many other capabilities that Mastiff does not have. I do not detract from Mastiff; it is armoured up in Coventry in my constituency. It is a fantastic vehicle that gives huge protection to our troops, but its use is extremely limited. The hon. Lady said that the Secretary of State visited Basra in a Mastiff. I was not allowed into Musa Kala because I would have to have done so in a Mastiff and it was not the right vehicle; but someone will have to go there if we want our troops to be effective in the Afghan theatre. Mastiff cannot be the only vehicle; as has been said, we have to provide a range of vehicles to meet the threat and to allow our troops to do the job.

The hon. Lady seemed to be complaining that we are using the equipment that we have in the theatres in which we are fighting. Yes, we are using the Tornado, but using it effectively. They fly in pairs, so they can stay over target for a long time.

Swimming

12.30 pm

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I confess that I applied for this debate because I enjoy swimming. When I was a child, I learned to swim in the baths at Penarth, which are now a nightclub; my younger brother suddenly realised that he could swim when he fell out of his water wings and into the pool at the age of two; and I won the scout diving cup in Stirling in 1974, I believe. It is therefore a delight to be able to raise this issue, even if the Government pre-empted me, after I had obtained the debate, by announcing further support for swimming last week.

I shall come to some of the specific issues that the Government announcement has made us think about, but I should first say that I started putting my speech together in the pool in Bronwydd in the Rhondda—more or less in the pool, at any rate. Swimming beside me, interestingly, was the Wales triathlon champion, who is the grandson of my predecessor as MP for Rhonda and a fine member of the Labour party. I hope that he wins his races this summer.

Britain has a fine tradition in swimming. It is one sport that we have done particularly well at in Olympic games—we have won 15 gold, 23 silver and 28 bronze medals, and we won the gold in water polo in 1900, 1908, 1912 and 1920, but not since. I am sure that many British people were proud of the haul of swimming medals not only from Australia but from Athens, and that they look forward to Liam Hancock, David Davies and Kirsty Balfour, among others, doing well in the summer. I am sure that the media will be more fascinated by how Tom Daley, the teenage diver, does in his first Olympics.

One of the great things about swimming is that it is not only about the elite. It is the only sport that is enjoyed equally by girls and boys and by people at different stages of life, which makes it inclusive. It is a joy to see whole families go swimming—they cannot take part in other sports together in the same way. The health implications are significant, because even a person who has sprained an ankle, or who has back pain or arthritis, can go swimming. Even people with severe mobility problems can go swimming. It is a low-impact sport and—unless one is playing water polo—non-contact. Bringing the whole community together is one of the great aspects of swimming.

The downside is that swimming is one of the most expensive sports—not for the individual, but for the state. Whereas 50 years ago, swimming baths were mostly open air and relatively cheap to run, they are now almost universally indoor and expensive to run. The people at the baths at Ystrad in my constituency recently discovered that several million pounds would have to be spent simply to restore the base of the pool—they realised that the pool had concrete cancer and that one could easily punch a hole in the cement. Perhaps no one will notice the significant difference that the investment made, but it goes to show that swimming is an expensive sport for local authorities and Government to make available.

I am delighted by the commitment that the Government made last week to try to make swimming free for over-60s and younger people. We have tried the same thing in Wales in the past two years following a commitment from the Welsh Assembly, and it is important that the Government spot some of the problems that we have had there. For instance, it is all very well saying that swimming is free for over-60s, but if the same people simply swim more frequently for free, we will not increase the number of people who swim.

There are all sorts of barriers to people going swimming. First, obviously, a lot of people cannot swim. The Government have for a long time had a commitment to ensuring that every child going through school learns to swim so that they can swim by the time they leave, but the number of people in poorer communities in England and Wales who cannot swim is still high—some 25 per cent. cannot do so. The number of people who cannot swim is markedly higher in poorer areas. I am sure that there are all sorts of reasons for that, but it brings me to one of the most important barriers: money.

Middle-class and wealthier families can afford tuition fees for their youngster to learn to swim, which amount to about £5 an hour in most areas of the country, but many poorer families cannot, especially if there are two or three children, so many youngsters do not get the opportunity to learn to swim. Also, some people in their 30s and 40s stop playing football or rugby because of injury and look to take up another sport, but they cannot take up swimming because they cannot swim—they feel embarrassed about it and never go near a swimming pool. It is important to ensure that swimming lessons are more affordable, particularly for children from poorer areas, and that schools are more effective at ensuring that children learn to swim.

A greater barrier to many people taking part in swimming, particularly women, is that they find the whole environment of the pool unfriendly, embarrassing and lacking in privacy. If changing rooms are dirty and not frequently cleaned, people worry about hygiene and getting infections. Other countries have learned about those things rather faster than us. Many people go on holiday and stay in hotels with beautiful, well looked-after swimming pools with private changing rooms, so when they get back to their local baths and find that there are no such rooms, nowhere for families to change together and that the showers are either scalding hot or freezing cold, they think, "Maybe this isn't for us." Other countries have invested as much in changing rooms and other facilities in swimming pools as in the pool itself, which we need to do. Some local authorities have transformed the swimming experience, especially for families, but we need to ensure that that best practice is followed throughout the country.

Some local authorities work jointly with the private sector to ensure that new baths, nearly all of which are in private sector facilities such as hotels and leisure centres, are available to the wider public. That way, there is an investment in the whole community. We need to do far more of that kind of thing. There are between 1,400 and 1,600 public swimming pools in England, and about 6,000 private pools of one kind or another. If we could make the latter available, we could make a significant difference in enabling more people to take up an active, healthy lifestyle through swimming.

There is a further difficulty. Local authorities have a mix of leisure facilities—they may have football and rugby fields and so on, and changes in society may mean that local sports clubs change from football to rugby or the other way around—and are constantly working to get the right mix. All too often, decisions on older swimming baths, which might need dramatic amounts of financial investment, are delayed year after year until it is too late to save them. That is why, even in central London, quite a few historic baths have closed. That is a shame, not particularly because the buildings were of enormous historical merit, but because some of those baths were in exactly the right place—in the centre of cities, where they were convenient for people to use at lunch time and other times of the day, and in the evening. We need to do more to ensure that local authorities have an ongoing, rolling programme of investment in their swimming pools so that they do not suddenly realise that they have a dramatic problem and must find £5 million or £10 million, with the result that they decide that they cannot afford to keep their pools open.

Large numbers of people go swimming, but the truth is that we could not survive without the volunteers who run the swim clubs. There are 300 volunteers involved in swim clubs in Wales, and they ensure that people can do not only the jumping-in-the-pool, messing-around kind of swimming, but the hard, up-and-down lane swimming—1,000 m of breaststroke, freestyle and so on. However, swim clubs are finding it increasingly difficult to survive not only because of the charges that local authorities levy on them for holding sessions, but because it is more and more difficult to get volunteers to commit themselves—particularly to getting the training that they need to act as coaches.

In that respect, I wholeheartedly support the introduction of the United Kingdom coaching certificate, which is an excellent measure that is increasingly professionalising the coaching that we provide in swim clubs. However, it is expensive to do the courses. A level 1 course, which takes 37 hours, costs £370 per individual, while a level 2 course costs £650 and requires 50 hours of commitment. That requires a significant investment from the individual, and I wonder whether there is a way of ensuring that Government resources can flow more readily down to the swim clubs so that more people can train as coaches, particularly in some of the poorer areas of the country.

As has been well attested in the Culture, Media and Sport Committee report on swimming in 2001-02 and in many debates in the House, one problem for elite swimmers in this country is that we have remarkably few 50 m pools—we have 19 in England and one in Wales, which is fewer than in Berlin or Paris. That is a problem not because everybody wants to swim 50 m all the time, but because we have only two venues where we can have an international-standard event. To hold such events, one must have not only a 50 m pool for swimming but a warm-up 50 m pool, and the pools must be 10 lanes wide, with a variety of adequate facilities on site. There is also the difficulty of training elite swimmers. It is difficult for Team GB to find somewhere for the whole team to swim continually for a fortnight or three weeks without completely disrupting everybody else's ordinary swimming. That is why the Government need to think further about developing more 50 m pools.

The new 50 m pool in Wales is wonderful, and creative ways have been found to use it so that a variety of events can be held there—it is not used just for elite swimming or by people ploughing up and down the lanes. Everybody is proud of the new pool, but it would be nice if we had more like it. Obviously, we will have the new aquatic centre for the Olympics, but it is important that the whole of London and, indeed, the whole south-east feel that it has a stake in it after the Olympics.

The next issue that I want to raise is one that affects volunteers and those involved in swimming. Fifty years ago, everybody would have been happy to take photographs of all the kids taking part in the annual swimming gala or the school swimming gala, but the sad truth is that most local authorities now understandably have strict rules about what photographs can be taken, and everybody has to have signed a form giving permission for their child's photograph to be taken.

Similarly, it is obviously important that swimming coaches and everybody involved in teaching young people to swim have proper accreditation, so that parents can be secure in the knowledge that their child is safe in every sense. With the passage of the Criminal Records Bureau to the Independent Safeguarding Authority, it is important that the cost of checks, which may be quite significant for small swimming clubs, be met by the Government, not the clubs themselves. Checks should also be done swiftly. Furthermore, it should be possible to transfer a check that was made when somebody wanted to become a rugby, cricket or golf coach, should they then wish to become a swimming coach. One difficulty is that we are overloading the system by not allowing people to transfer checks from one sport to another.

There is another issue alongside that. When we move to the new points-based system of immigration, which I wholeheartedly support, it is important that we ensure that coaches—particularly in international sports such as swimming, which rely on coaches travelling around the world and working in different countries—can enter this country without facing an overly complicated process of immigration checks.

I wholeheartedly support what the Government are doing to ensure that more people swim. Swimming is one of the few sports in which everybody can engage, whatever their age or physical ability. My only concern is that if we simply make swimming free for those who already swim, we will have achieved nothing through our investment in swimming. We need to overcome some of the barriers to people taking up swimming. In particular, we need ensure that there are more coaches and volunteers and that it is easier for local swimming clubs to survive and prosper. We need to ensure that there are more swimming pools and that private pools are more available to the whole of society, while public pools are more engaging and pleasant places to go for a swim. If we can do that, the number of people who go swimming will significantly increase.

12.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I wholeheartedly support my hon. Friend—I do mean my hon. Friend—the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) and I congratulate him on the timing of his debate. He talked about the announcements last Friday, but he has been keen on this issue for a long time, and he mentioned his exploits as a young child, on which I congratulate him.

I offer my support to swimmers in Wales, and particularly to those who will go on to represent Great Britain at the Olympics. Like my hon. Friend, I wish them well, whether they are taking part in the Olympic games in Beijing or training and developing for the London Olympics in 2012. I particularly offer my support to Tom Daley, who has inspired many people not only with his diving exploits, but with his demeanour and the way in which he acts as a role model for many others.

[Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe]

It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Pope. I think that this is the first time that I have done so, so I am delighted to see you in the Chair.

My hon. Friend rightly set out a number of issues, which we are aware of, to ensure that we are successful in our ambition of getting more people swimming. It is important that we get more people active in sport. My hon. Friend will be aware of the legacy challenge that we set ourselves of getting 2 million more people engaged in physical activity and sport by 2012, and swimming can play a key role in that.

I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend's points about swimming provision, the quality of pools and the need to make sporting experiences, whatever they are, credible and something that people want to pursue. If the sports superstructure is not up to standard, young people in particular will do other things, so we must ensure that the sporting experience that we present is enjoyable. My hon. Friend is particularly right about matters such as changing rooms and how confident people feel in the environment of the swimming pool. Those points are important and I hope that they will be dealt with when we consider the facility strategies that local authorities need for new and existing pools.

My hon. Friend's timing is, as always, impeccable, given last week's announcement by the Secretary of State. That really was joined-up government, with several Departments coming together regarding the aspiration for free swimming for the over-60s and making under-16s a priority by 2012. My hon. Friend is right to say that that has been happening in Wales for some time—I know that Rhodri Morgan and the Sports Minister in Wales are particularly pleased by the development—and that we must keep the initiative alive by encouraging more people to take part, not just the same ones who are now doing so. I hope that, with the support of the Amateur Swimming Association and British Swimming, it will be possible to offer good experiences of swimming, whether for people who want to enjoy the fun pool or for serious swimmers who want to get involved in competitive swimming. We want to ensure that there is a route all the way through, so that swimming is enjoyable and there is an opportunity for people to get involved.

The active people survey in 2005-06 showed that swimming was perhaps the nation's most popular physical activity, with 17 per cent. of women and 12 per cent. of men swimming at least once a month. Swimming is the sport with the second highest rate of participation, after football, for children aged 11 to 16, with 38 per cent. participating in and out of school. It is also the most popular physical activity for the over-60s, with 7 per cent. taking part at least once a month. The Government are committed to good quality swimming and diving provision throughout the country. Since 1997 almost £250 million of public money has been invested in swimming—more than for any other sport. More swimming pools are opening than are closing, in both local authority and private sectors.

It is too simplistic, however, to look at sporting provision simply in terms of quantity. My hon. Friend touched on a very important point about where pools are, and whether those are public or private. I am engaged with several bodies in considering the spare capacity that private sector pools might have to offer swimming to others, at times when the private sector cannot fill the pools. I believe that we should, particularly through county sports partnerships, local area agreements and local authority facility strategies, come to a greater understanding of how we can bring public and private sectors together, and of the opportunities that exist in that context. What we envisage will not work unless there is a willingness to use the available facilities.

As part of the incentive, I am trying to ensure that we drive through a strategy to achieve world-class swimming facilities throughout the country. Local government has a key role to play in that. The offer of free swimming that we announced last week is, as I have explained, part of getting 2 million more people active by 2012. Swimming will make an important contribution to the meeting of our goals. In broad terms, we shall offer local authorities funding to allow them to introduce free swimming for people aged over 60 and further measures designed to promote increased participation in swimming, particularly for under-16s. We are also offering a capital fund for the renovation and maintenance of pools, including school pools, in support of such schemes.

I had a constituency issue regarding the closure of a pool in my constituency—the Buttershaw school pool. There is an opportunity now for Conservative-led Bradford council to put its money where its mouth is and support what we are trying to achieve through allowing greater access to swimming by making sure that the pool stays open. I should be happy at any time to meet the local authority to discuss future funding to do that. As my hon. Friend has said, swimming is an emotive issue. People want pools to be protected, and in some cases there is an opportunity for local authorities to shut a dilapidated pool in the hope of replacing it. In Bradford, pools have closed but have not been reopened elsewhere. I hope that that can be put right. My hon. Friend made the same point about pools in Wales. We must protect existing pools, and through the offer of the capital fund it may be possible to assist some local authorities in Wales and elsewhere to maintain pools that need attention.

It is important to consider the issue of elite sport and to take the opportunity to make sure that we have the right pools. Particularly relevant are the 50 m pools that my hon. Friend described. There are 18 indoor 50 m swimming pools in England, and a further nine, such as at Portsmouth and Hillingdon, are either under construction or proposed. Therefore, every region in England will have at least one 50 m swimming pool. We are told by Sport England that that will meet the demand that exists for quality and the right location.

School swimming is vital, and my hon. Friend is right to raise the issue of lessons and their cost. We want to include that in our discussions about how we fulfil the aspiration of free swimming, particularly in relation to hard-to-reach groups: people on low incomes who cannot afford to learn to swim, and people who do not think that swimming is for them. We want to open the access and opportunities as much as we can. My hon. Friend has pointed out that swimming is universal—it is an activity that people can do together. Whole families at different levels of ability can go together and enjoy being in the pool.

We believe that the situation in Wales is a good example of how things can be done. To develop things further throughout the country, we need to learn some lessons from what happened in Wales. My hon. Friend is right to say that broadly, everyone is happy with the proposals and the development of the free swimming agenda in Wales. It is encouraging for me to see how leading local authorities such as Wigan, which now offers opportunities for free swimming, have learned lessons from what has been done elsewhere.

All hon. Members of all political persuasions will welcome the announcements that we made on Friday, on the basis that we have an opportunity to consider the health and well-being of the nation and the need to get people physically active. The foresight report revealed problems in relation to obesity and the horrendous challenges that we shall face if people do not become more active in future years. We all know the burden and the cost that there will be to society and Government because of the effect on health. Swimming gives people the opportunity to experience the delight and health benefits of being active and an increased heart rate, thereby becoming fitter.

Swimming is a key element of the sporting activity that we can enjoy. We need to be successful in what we propose and to make sure that we achieve our aspiration by 2012. The swimming authorities—particularly the ASA—have given detailed attention to the matter. My hon. Friend will be aware of the recent cycling championships and the 10 out of 17 available gold medals that were won; cycling is a sport that has been looked at right from the start. The same has happened with swimming at every level; there has been consideration of what is needed to improve participation levels at recreational sites, and of how to develop the sport all the way through. I was pleased a few weeks ago to be at the 50 m pool in Manchester to see swimmers—UK swimmers in particular—succeeding at the Paralympic World cup. It was inspiring to see them deliver championship performances.

Swimming, like most sports, connects people and is an inspiration to them. It can develop self-esteem and encourage teamwork. The timing of today's debate is appropriate. I hope that my hon. Friend will continue to support our ambition of making sure that swimming is delivered according to the widest possible remit. I congratulate him on securing the debate.

NHS Co-payments (Mrs. O'Boyle)

12.59 pm

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the case of my late constituent, Linda O'Boyle, who died earlier this year, sadly, after treatment for bowel cancer. Her case is both terribly sad and hugely frustrating. She was a warm-hearted woman with a great sense of humour who gave much of her life to the national health service and helping others. When she became ill, she had every right to expect that the NHS would be there for her, but it was not. The health service let her down in her hour of need.

Many patients have suffered because the NHS does not allow co-payments, which involve a patient paying privately for a drug not funded by the NHS while continuing to receive the basic NHS package of care. If patients want to top up their care, Government policy requires that free NHS treatment be withdrawn. Often, treatment is eventually delivered within the NHS setting, but the patient is presented with the bill for all aspects of care. Sometimes, as in the O'Boyle case, the patient is forced to go private for everything.

The facts of the case are straightforward. Linda was diagnosed with bowel cancer, and at first her treatment at Basildon and Southend hospitals went well. However, it was decided that she needed a second line of treatment with irinotecan earlier than planned. Then her consultant had to inform the family that treatment was not working, which came as a great shock. The desire to save or extend the life of a loved one is immensely strong. The family were desperate to find another treatment, and the consultant suggested that only cetuximab offered a realistic hope of extending Linda's life.

However, as we know, cetuximab is not available on the NHS, as it was turned down by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence on the grounds of cost-effectiveness. Whatever one's views about NICE and the fairness of some of its decisions, the relevant fact is simply that state-funded health care was unable to provide Mrs. O'Boyle with the treatment that her clinician said she needed.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman talks about "free" and "state-funded" NHS care. I remind him of his Thatcherite roots. We taxpayers, including Linda, pay for our care.

Mr. Baron: I accept that point 100 per cent. Mrs. O'Boyle had paid for her care through her taxes, of course, which is why her care should have been free, to use my terminology. She should not have had to pay for it. That is the cause of the problem.

Mr. Field: If one accepts that we pay for our NHS care at a different time than we draw the benefit, the false dichotomy that the Government have erected falls to the ground. One wishes to top up the payments that one has already made. Given that the Government want to encourage public-private sector arrangements, I find it extraordinary that they do not want public-individual citizen projects such as the one Linda wished to do.

Mr. Baron: I fully accept where the right hon. Gentleman is coming from. I take his point on board, particularly considering—I shall come to this point later—that in many other areas of the NHS, patients can top up without having their care withdrawn. That is a contradiction that the Government need to resolve.

[Mr. Baron]

The family decided to pay privately for the drug. Mrs. O'Boyle had hoped to receive cetuximab at the family's expense at Southend hospital while continuing to receive care as a cancer patient. It is worth emphasising that the family were exceptionally happy at that stage with the care that they had received within the NHS. The issue is not about doctors, nurses or consultants, for they did an excellent job of caring for Linda as far as they were allowed; it is about Government policy, which prevents them from doing their job.

One might have expected the NHS to do everything possible to help Linda O'Boyle—after all, its purpose is to extend life—but the family were told that that would not be the case. The family ended up paying for all the necessary treatment, including care that ought to have been available on the NHS. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that the NHS effectively walked away from a dying woman in her moment of need, a woman who had given most of her life to the NHS.

Naturally, the cost to the family was huge. They also had to meet the cost of private consultations, prescription charges and home nursing care and pay the full market price for irinotecan and cetuximab. Taking everything into account, the total cost was around £14,000. It would have been £50,000 if Linda had survived the full six months of treatment. Seeking to extend the life of loved ones is not an aspiration unique to the rich. People are prepared to make great sacrifices to hold on to someone they love.

With the family's consent, I raised the issue with some newspapers, and it has received very good coverage during the past few weeks. Such publicity is never easy for the relatives involved, but Mr. O'Boyle and his sons took the decision to go public because they feel strongly that what happened to Linda was wrong and must not happen to other people. I commend them for that attitude. Mr. O'Boyle and one of his sons have joined us for this debate. Many other patients all over the country find themselves in similar situations. The Sunday Times, among others, has done splendid work to give them a voice. The best-known example is probably the breast cancer patient Colette Mills.

As for the arguments used by the Government to prevent patients from making co-payments, I have the benefit of anticipating some of the Minister's remarks, as I wrote to the Secretary of State earlier in the year about the issue. The reply that I received was, in my view, confused and inhumane. Let us be clear: co-payments are not about taking care from any other patient in order to help another patient go private. A drug is paid for privately, not subsidised by the state. The arrangement represents a move to a Pareto optimum. One patient benefits without any other patient being harmed.

The Government say that co-payments must be banned because otherwise we would be treating patients unfairly and creating a two-tier system, in which all patients would not be treated equally. That argument misses the point. Simply because a patient opts for some non-NHS treatments does not mean that the NHS cannot treat all patients equally in respect of the state-funded care that they receive. Each patient can still receive the same level of NHS care. Patients seeking co-payments are not asking for special favours, preferential treatment or a hand up from the NHS; they are simply asking for their standard package of care to be continued alongside the top-up. Patients whose NHS care has been withdrawn feel, understandably, that they are the ones being discriminated against because of their ability to pay. That cannot be right.

There is a world of difference between treating all patients equally and penalising some patients because they have the means to top up their treatment. It makes a mockery of the Government's second argument for banning co-payments, which is that a ban is somehow needed to keep the NHS free at the point of need. However, in the case of Colette Mills or Linda O'Boyle, the NHS is the very opposite of free at the point of need. Not all drugs are available on the NHS, because NICE turns down some treatments. Also, free NHS care is withdrawn when patients try to top up. That is not care free at the point of need.

The Government have a novel way of trying to get around the problem: they hide behind semantics. The Government argue that NHS guidance states clearly that someone cannot simultaneously be an NHS and a privately funded patient of the same NHS hospital within the same episode of care and that all NHS treatment for the same condition, such as bowel cancer, counts towards the same episode of care. Ostensibly, it is because the Government do not want to mix private and public funding, but that argument is clearly absurd. For one thing, some drugs are available free on the NHS and others are not. How can two treatments be part of the same episode of care if one is free and the other is not?

If the health service itself has chosen to differentiate between treatments through the NICE process, it is hypocritical to condemn patients for seeking to do likewise. Michael Summers of the Patients Association made that point in a similar way. He suggested that the public does not see the same episode of care as being a crucial distinction. At the end of the day, the public will just say that care is care. The Government are hiding behind the semantics of how one defines an episode of care, because they lack the courage, or perhaps even the initiative, to deal with unjust policy. All that is required is an open mind, and then guidance can be changed.

Another reason why the Government's position is perverse is that co-payments are already happening throughout the NHS and other public services. If I go to an optician as an NHS patient, and receive a free pair of glasses, nothing is to prevent me from using my own money to buy contact lenses—NHS care is not withdrawn. Likewise, if I go to a dentist and have an NHS filling, and then pay privately to have teeth cleaning or whitening, NHS care is not withdrawn. Meanwhile, we have private beds in NHS hospitals, using NHS equipment and staff. Again, patients do not have other aspects of care withdrawn. We could look outside the NHS: state education is not withdrawn simply because a child has access to private tuition. The state education system is there for everyone, regardless of whether private tuition takes place—state education is not withdrawn.

What is so different about cancer drugs and treatment? If co-payments are good enough for teeth whitening and contact lenses, why are they not good enough when it comes to prolonging, extending and perhaps even saving life? Many people are asking those questions outside this Chamber, but no one seems to have an answer—certainly not the Government. Britain's cancer survival rates still lag behind the European average, partly because we do not have the same access to the best new drugs. In that respect, we are the poor patients of Europe, which is shameful given that Britain is home to some of the leading drug companies in the world, and to some of the leading cancer research institutes in Europe. The NHS needs all the help that it can get. If anything, we should be empowering, not penalising, patients who opt for co-payments.

This issue will not go away. Many exciting new drugs are coming through the pipeline, and it is forecast that they will be available over the coming decade. Patients and their clinicians will, understandably, want to use them, but NICE will not be in a position to give the thumbs up to all of them. The NHS has a hard choice to make: does it stick with the current policy, born of ideological dogma? Does it hold back patients from accessing the best care for themselves and their families? Does it walk away from dying men and women whose only offence is to use their own money to extend their lives? Or do we, as a nation, do what we can to empower as many people as possible to access the best of the new treatments, without holding back, or penalising, those who cannot afford top-ups? The only civilised answer, for any nation facing this dilemma, is to save, or prolong, life wherever possible. Anything else is a far greater betrayal of the founding principles of the NHS and medicine. This inhumane and illogical policy will one day change. The question is: how long will it take the Government to recognise that, and how many patients will pay the price between now and then?

1.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I congratulate the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) on securing this debate, and join him in publicly offering my condolences to Mr. O'Boyle, and his sons, on the loss of his wife. Unless one has been in such a situation, one can never fully understand what it must be like to experience such pain and misery. However, it is easy to talk about Government being inhumane, but I think that it is a cheap shot—nobody in this situation is inhumane. Politicians on both sides of the House have experienced the same situation, and we should try and avoid making party political jibes. It is an incredibly serious and substantive issue that merits a serious and substantive political and public debate in order to reach the right conclusions.

Mr. Baron: I think that the Minister misheard. I did not accuse the Government of being inhumane, but the policy. I want to make it clear that I am certainly not trying to play party politics.

Mr. Lewis: I accept the hon. Gentleman's reassurances. We have some very important and serious issues to address as part of this debate.

It is difficult to explain, but it would not be appropriate to talk about an individual case, so I must keep my remarks general at this stage. However, we must be clear that no one should ever be denied the offer of NHS care. That is a fundamental principle, on which our guidance is clear. Patients are entitled to switch from privately funded to NHS-funded status, and should then receive treatment on the same basis as any other NHS patient, and be offered treatment based on clinical need. Any previous status as a privately funded patient should, as far as is practical, neither disadvantage them nor allow them to access NHS care in a preferential way.

More treatments than ever are now available on the NHS, and cancer treatment and survival rates in this country have improved dramatically. However, any publicly funded health care system will always have to make difficult decisions about what treatments are available, and some treatments are not generally available on the NHS. We set up NICE, which is now regarded as a world leader, to assess the clinical and cost effectiveness of drugs and treatments based on the latest evidence. Primary care trusts have a statutory duty to fund the use of drugs that are recommended by NICE technology appraisals, ensuring that proven treatments are available to everybody.

The inevitable consequence of the NICE process, however, is that some PCTS will decide not to fund some treatments. For example, a treatment might not have received a safety licence from the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency, or NICE might find that it does not give patients enough clinical benefit to justify the expense. Those decisions are never taken lightly, and NICE will always find itself in difficulty when making decisions seen to deny people drugs that they genuinely believe will make a difference to the length or quality of their lives. There is never a controversy when NICE approves drugs, but it will inevitably follow some of the incredibly difficult decisions that it must make.

There has been tremendous political consensus about the virtues of having a NICE-type system to make some of those very difficult decisions: it is removed from party politics and creates an entirely independent process governed by legislation established in this House. It is important to be clear that it would be inappropriate for Ministers to intervene in and undermine every difficult decision that NICE makes.

Mr. Baron: I accept what the Minister says to a certain extent, but in this context NICE is a bit of a red herring. The point here is about co-payments and access to drugs not available on NICE—not about how it makes its decision. Patients should not be penalised by an NHS that then withdraws care simply because they have access to those drugs.

Mr. Lewis: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, but for many patients and families, the difficult decisions that NICE makes are sometimes a great source of angst. They can find those decisions hard to understand because they believe that having access to a certain drug would make a massive difference to their chances of living or dying. It is important to contextualise the debate in that sense.

Moving to the specific issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised, we are not in the business of denying people access to private treatment if that is what they want. A patient may receive both NHS and private treatment for the same condition, in parallel, as long as—this is the key phrase—the two treatments are in separate episodes of care. Our most recent guidance specifies that a patient cannot be both a private and an NHS patient for the treatment of one condition during a single visit to an NHS organisation, but an in-patient can choose to change their status before the treatment begins provided that they are then assessed to determine their priority for NHS care. I reiterate that that has been the position in this country for at least two decades and is not a consequence of any particular NHS reform by the Labour Government. The position is more difficult when a patient seeks to pay for part of an episode of care while expecting the NHS to pay for the rest. That has never been allowed in the 60 years of the NHS.

[Mr. Ivan Lewis]

The legal basis for the ban on mixing private and public funding is in section 1 of the National Health Service Act 2006, which says that NHS services

"must be free of charge except in so far as the making and recovery of charges is expressly provided for by or under any enactment, whenever passed."

That prevents NHS bodies from accepting payments for NHS services unless that is provided for in legislation. It also prevents an NHS body from providing an incomplete package of care that patients then top up. For example, if a patient's treatment is the administration of a particular drug, their treatment includes both the purchase and administration of that drug. If an NHS organisation allows a patient to pay for a drug but administers it on the NHS, it is effectively charging for an NHS service.

Mr. Frank Field: May I make a plea to the Minister, who is held in high esteem in this House? I hope that when he goes back he will tell his Department that he does not want to be sent out with a brief like this again. We are arguing not about what the law is—we know what the law is—but for the law to be changed. Will he deal with that?

Mr. Lewis: I will: I was about to say that section 1 is consistent with the way in which the NHS has considered this issue. My right hon. Friend is not being disingenuous, but it is slightly disingenuous to accuse successive generations of clinicians, politicians and other people who believe passionately in the NHS of not having considered this issue in fundamental depth. Of course, there needs to be a debate on this issue, but it is not a new issue that has emerged in the past few days, weeks or months. It has been a constant debate throughout the 60 years of the NHS.

Ministers have to place on record the legal realities. The hon. Gentleman and others are arguing for a significant change in legislation, which would, arguably, be a significant change in the fundamental ethos that underpins the NHS. That might be a source of difference between us, but to change the legislation and policy in the way that he advocates would be a major shift in policy and legislation. We must also be aware, as I know that my right hon. Friend is, of unintended consequences, which I shall address in a moment.

Mr. Baron: The Minister talks about a major shift being required, but the only major shift that is required is having an open mind to changing the guidance. Top-ups, or co-payments, already exist in many areas of the NHS—I have cited some examples. Will the Minister address a specific point? The Department's ban on co-payments takes the form of guidance rather than instruction, which means that NHS trusts across the country are using their discretion when such cases arise. If the Minister truly believes his argument against co-payments, why does he not close that loophole? He says that this matter has been discussed for quite some time.

Mr. Lewis: We would have to be persuaded that that would be right, would be in the interests of patients and would take account of the almost daily advances in medical science for health care in this country and globally. To look at this issue in the context of the situation facing the O'Boyle family, it would be difficult not to feel tremendous empathy with the case being made, but we must consider, if we are to change policy or legislation, that there might be a series of unintended consequences that might not be apparent to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lewis: I have given way enough, but I will give way one last time.

Mr. Baron: We are not being party political, so we can be generous in giving way. Perhaps I did not express myself clearly, but the Minister did not address my central point. The Department's policy on co-payments—the ban on them—is in the form of guidance, not instruction. That allows PCTs up and down the country to use their discretion when implementing co-payments or not doing so. If the Minister is absolutely convinced by the case against co-payments, why does not he simply ban them and close that loophole? The Government are allowing the loophole to exist.

Mr. Lewis: We will have to consider that point as a consequence of this debate. No one is suggesting that we can ignore the sensitive and difficult considerations that the issue of top-ups raises, such as whether NHS guidance is being applied consistently across the country. We have a constant debate in the NHS about the balance between having a universal, national service and having local flexibility, discretion and autonomy. To some extent, the aspiration of all Governments is to minimise postcode lotteries where possible. We know that decisions taken at the local level can, from time to time, be very different depending on the judgments of managers and clinicians, and this matter is no different to that. However, we are willing to consider the implications of the debate in the context of an ever-moving landscape of treatments and drugs that are becoming available.

I conclude by quoting Dr. Colin Trask, the director of clinical oncology at Southend hospital, whose comments are important. He has said.

"At Southend hospital, our annual budget for drugs has gone from £1 million to £6million over the past decade. We have the money to spend on drugs. It's not about cost. It's about what is best, not just for a patient's life but for their quality of life...If it was in their interests, they would get" the drug. He went on:

"Even if it is not available on the NHS, we would try to find a way to get it for them, by referring them somewhere they could get it, perhaps as part of a drug trial. But if it wouldn't help them, we would explain the drug is very toxic and would mean them spending their last bit of time in hospital feeling very ill...Also, with cancer treatments, it can be extremely dangerous to mix certain drugs, so there are genuine safety concerns behind these co-payment regulations...these days, people hear of drugs through the media which are hyped as miracle cures when really that not the case."

Dr. Trask is an eminent clinician, and he has highlighted my point about the potential unintended consequences of simply changing law and policy in a way that some would describe as common sense and fair, but that others would define as opening a can of worms. Such a change might lead to a situation that would not be in the interests of patients and the NHS.

Mr. Baron: Does the Minister consider that a doctor's professional duty to his patients overrides the Department's guidance—returning to guidance again—where the two may be in conflict?

Mr. Greg Pope (in the Chair): Order. I am very sorry, but we have to move on to the next debate.

Unused Medicines

1.30 pm

Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured the debate and privileged to take part in it under your chairmanship, Mr. Pope. I must declare an interest at the outset: my wife is a locum pharmacist. Obviously, the words that I shall deliver will be mine, but I am bound to be influenced by our conversations at home. It is because of them that I have taken a long-term interest in medicines management in the NHS.

Unused medicines are costly. It is estimated that they cost the taxpayer as much as £800 million a year in the UK, as the Department of Health estimates that as much as 10 per cent. of all drugs prescribed are wasted. The value of medicines returned to pharmacies and general practice surgeries is thought to be some £100 million annually. Wasted medication is costing the NHS in the north-west, for example—you will understand this yourself, Mr. Pope—some £40 million annually, and £2.5 million in Wirral alone. That could pay, for example, for 500 more hip replacements, 350 more heart bypass operations or 3,500 more cataract operations. I am not saying that they are directly related, but that is a lot of money that could be used for beneficial health treatment.

In addition to those vast sums, the National Audit Office has estimated that primary care trusts could save more than £200 million, without affecting clinical outcomes, through more efficient prescribing. There is thus a business of waste that costs something of the order of £1 billion. There are two issues at hand: the prevention of medicines wastage and the encouragement of more efficient prescribing. I have limited time at my disposal, but I shall suggest some ways in which we might conserve time, money and staff resources. I wish first to explore how we can prevent the wasting of medicines, starting with the patient's role.

Patient concordance, as it is known—the extent to which patients comply in taking the medicines prescribed to them—is a key issue, and more research needs to be conducted. Those who prescribe and administer medicines need to ask more questions about the deficit in patient concordance. The recently published White Paper, "Pharmacy in England: building on strengths—delivering the future" acknowledges that.

An analysis of unused medicines returned to one PCT alone showed that half the packs were returned unopened. There are a few key reasons for that. Often, patients prefer their GP not to know that they are not taking their medicine, so they go on ordering it. There are those who think that they simply know best. They believe, broadly speaking, that drugs are harmful to them and they therefore do not take the medicine prescribed. Patients can also be fussy, often wanting a more expensive brand rather than a generic version of a drug. They do not like foreign or parallel imported medicine, or the less well known brands. Newly qualified doctors and dentists, perhaps out of caution, prefer to prescribe brand rather than generic medication. The costs associated with over-prescribing are therefore exacerbated by expensive prescribing.

There are large variations between PCTs in the extent to which GPs prescribe lower-cost drugs for the same conditions. Statins are one example. In the second quarter of 2006-07, the proportion of statin prescriptions that were lower-cost versions varied from 28 to 86 per cent.

[Ben Chapman]

among PCTs in England. Analysis of the prescription of four common types of medicines, which represent 19 per cent. of the drugs bill, showed that more than £200 million could be saved if all PCTs prescribed as efficiently as the top performing 25 per cent.

In patients' minds, there remains an incorrect assumption that drugs can be reused if returned. For example, 14 per cent. of patients believe that medication given back to a pharmacist or pharmacy can be redispensed to others who come in with a prescription for the same thing at a later date. Some 26 per cent. believe that unwanted medicines are sent to poorer, underdeveloped countries and can be used by patients who live there, and 14 per cent. of patients appear to believe that the NHS can get its money back when it returns drugs to their original producer. They think that the pharmacist can just send them back to the people who produced them. Those assumptions clearly need to be corrected if we are to reduce the amount of wasted drugs.

On a separate note, the environmental message does not appear to be well understood, either. Some 21 per cent. of patients dispose of waste medication in the dustbin together with their domestic rubbish, and 10 per cent. flush it down the toilet, with obvious environmental effects.

Repeat prescriptions can be administered through automatic reordering. That obviously has its advantages, but it also has its disadvantages. The fact that two different medications prescribed to a patient can have different cycles—for example, one lasting two weeks and the other eight—is not necessarily taken into account on the repeat prescription form. Therefore, each time a patient uses the form to get their next supply of medication, a backlog of unused medicines is collected. Equally, when repeat dispensing takes place, the process perhaps needs to be monitored more for errors.

The negative outcomes of unmonitored repeat prescribing and dispensing include stockpiling and patients taking medication that is no longer required. Should there not be a clear requirement that the patient or carer should request items individually every month? That is a matter for consideration. It is also important to note that our current system allows pharmacists to be paid one fee for each item on a repeat prescription. Perhaps that, too, needs to be considered and its cost-efficiency examined.

On another note, the self-administration of medicines by patients, which allows them custody and administration of their own medicines while they are in hospital, has been proved to improve patient compliance with medication regimes and so prevent treatment failure. In 2001, it was estimated that a quarter of hospital admissions were due to non-compliance with medicines regimes. Self-administration might therefore be encouraged whenever possible.

I wish briefly to mention the impact of medicines packaging on drug usage. Packages are often too large. Therefore, a patient might take only half the medication in any given packet. EU legislation on original pack dispensing stipulates that all relevant documentation should be included in a medicine's packaging. So, for example, blister packs of pills cannot be halved, as they would not necessarily be accompanied by the drug information found in the original packet.

There is no standardisation of pack sizes. Multi-packs regularly contain 30 pills for what might be a 28-day month. In itself, that is not a large difference, but multiplied across the board it means a fantastic number of wasted drugs. Other solutions such as smaller packets of drugs need to be found, to decrease medicine wastage.

I shall explore briefly how more efficient prescribing might be achieved. GPs' surgeries and hospitals can play their part, and GPs may need to communicate more effectively with their patients to ascertain whether they are taking their prescribed medication, so that it can quickly be stopped if that is no longer the case. Some patients decide to do as they think fit and not take drugs that they allege are harming them. Some surgeries give repeat prescriptions for two or three months as standard, which can result in huge wastage. Recent studies suggest that the supply of trial quantities of new medications to patients before the prescription of large amounts can help to reduce wastage.

An NAO report on medicines management in NHS hospitals raised concerns that some medical schools' curricula do not provide thorough enough instruction in medicine administration. About 70 per cent. of prescribing decisions are made by house officers and senior house officers, even though at that stage of their career they may have had little experience of medicines.

Only a small percentage of doctors in training report that their induction dealt adequately with medicines management issues. In addition, not all consultants are aware of the 30-day prescription limit on drugs, such as those for treatment of attention deficit. That suggests that much could be done to make those who prescribe medicines in hospitals more aware of up-to-date prescribing practice, which would encourage more efficient prescribing.

We must also look at the practice whereby prescriptions are passed directly from the GP to a pharmacy, whether it is one attached to the GP's surgery or another local pharmacy, on the basis of a phone call from the patient. There might have been little checking about whether the patient needed the ongoing prescription. There is also evidence that pharmacists are five times more accurate than doctors in writing discharge prescriptions. Where it is properly planned and supported, investment in clinical pharmacy improves the quality of patient care and reduces costs; I am sure that my wife will take note of that.

Pharmacies also inevitably play a role in this issue, especially in the form of medicines use reviews, which qualified pharmacists often conduct on behalf of individual patients. MURs, as they are known, are designed to help to reduce prescribing costs and wastage. However, MURs come at a significant cost, at around £27 each. They involve a patient having a one-to-one consultation with their local pharmacist about the medicines that they are taking, and in doing so they attempt to ensure that unnecessary wastage of medicines is prevented. Of course, I approve of that.

Furthermore, according to the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee, local evaluations of patient satisfaction with the service show that patient satisfaction is high. However, it has not been definitively proven that the benefits of that service outweigh the cost. In 2006-07, for example, accredited pharmacies in the Wirral PCT area alone were paid more than £100,000 for providing about 4,000 MURs. There have been instances where individual pharmacies have exceeded their maximum of 400 claim payments a year for MURs. In 2006-07, the excess payment was £67,650, or about 2,700 claims. It needs to be established that that exercise is necessary and not just an exercise for making money; that is perhaps not a well-chosen phrase.

There have been numerous awareness-raising campaigns locally to try to encourage patients not to waste their medicines. Wirral PCT recently launched a campaign to highlight the problem of wasted medicines, which was very effective. Indeed, I was able to be present when one pharmacy, P. Williams Pharmacy in Lower Heswall, received an award recently for the best window display in that regard.

GPs and community pharmacists joined the overall campaign by producing window displays that encouraged people not to stockpile medicines, only to order what was needed and to take all their prescriptions if they were going to hospital. However, I believe that such local campaigns only go so far, as they do not have the coverage that, for example, a national TV campaign would have. We need to invest in getting the message across, not just locally but across the country. An effectively co-ordinated national campaign and more work by and in relation to hospitals, pharmacies and GPs would increase awareness of this issue significantly.

I should like to comment briefly on the White Paper, "Pharmacy in England: building on strengths—delivering the future", which was published in April. That White Paper is obviously a very considerable step in the right direction, and its call for a more integrated approach when dealing with patients and their drugs is welcome. However, the White Paper failed to include significant detail about how that aim was to be achieved. In particular, it is crucial that it is explained how the Expert Panel on Health Services Research in Pharmacy will consider the longer-term impact of MURs on compliance with prescribed medicines.

I hope that I have helped to demonstrate that there are many reasons why medicines go unused and many factors that contribute to their wastage. Part of the problem is that there is no uni-professional approach. Various health care institutions have tackled the problem independently, rather than there being a single integrated health service structure situated within a given community. It is perhaps notable that there is no official guidance on the duration of prescriptions—a situation that may not be helpful. I believe that a national awareness-raising programme would be cost-effective in highlighting this issue, both to health care professionals and to patients.

It is fair to say that patients are not fully educated about medicine usage, first about the advantages of patient concordance and secondly about what happens to their medicines if they are not administered, even if they are later returned to a pharmacy. If people were more aware of the waste and the cost involved, surely less waste would occur.

What is needed is not just an approach that raises awareness but a systemic approach. I hope that the publication of the White Paper helps to bring together the strategy needed to tackle the issue of unused medicines, with the result that more money can be spent on health care services that will be used and valued, giving the taxpayer greater value for money. In health care, perhaps above all else, we cannot afford such high waste. Every penny going into health care needs to be effectively and wisely spent.

1.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ann Keen): It is a particular pleasure, Mr. Pope, to serve under your chairmanship today. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Ben Chapman) on securing this debate, and I know that this issue is of great interest to him. He has given a further explanation of that interest in relation to his home life, and I am pleased to see that it is so well cared for and that he is so well-informed.

I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government are concerned about wastage from unused, unwanted and returned medicines. From my own experience working as a district nurse, I am very aware of the importance of community pharmacists and of the explanations that patients receive from them about how to use and look after medication. However, I would be the first to put up my hand and say that we do not have a robust method for determining the scale and cost of medicines that are unused and therefore wasted. The figure of £100 million a year is often quoted for such wastage, but according to some, the figure may be as high as £800 million a year, as my hon. Friend mentioned.

Medicines wastage was highlighted in recent reports from both the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee when they considered prescribing in primary care. The view of both bodies was that a potential saving of £200 million to the NHS could be achieved by more effective prescribing, and that at least £100 million could be saved by reducing the amount of medicines that are wasted. They recommended that the Department of Health should update previous research to produce a more robust estimate of the scale of medicines wastage in England, and better information on why patients do not take their medicines as intended.

We have accepted those recommendations, and I am pleased to announce today that we have recently awarded a contract jointly to the universities of York and London to carry out research to determine the scale and cost of unused medicines and the varied and complex reasons why people do not take their medicines as intended. The findings of that research will inform policy development, influencing both health professionals and members of the public to reduce the amount of unwanted medicines, and providing value for money for the NHS. That research is now under way, and the results are expected to be available in 2009.

My hon. Friend mentioned medicines concordance and I am glad that he did so, as that is about involving patients in decisions on their prescribed medicines. This is another area in which we are working to improve matters, and the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence is developing clinical guidance on medicines concordance. It expects to publish its final guidance to the NHS in January 2009.

I agree with my hon. Friend that patients must play a big role in reducing the amount of wasted medicines. As I said, the reasons why people do not take their medicines as intended are varied and complex. Primary care trusts across the country are developing initiatives to raise awareness about waste medicines. In fact, NHS North West, which includes Wirral PCT—my hon. Friend's local PCT—carried out a major public awareness campaign toward the end of last year, aimed at achieving a significant reduction in the amount of unused medicines in the region, which would free up resources for local NHS services. We would encourage other areas to follow that example.

[Ann Keen]

It has long been the Department's policy to encourage the prescribing of medicines by their generic name. That is good professional practice, and it provides opportunities for more effective use of NHS resources. Generic drugs are generally cheaper than their branded equivalents, but just as effective.

As far back as 2000, we recognised that patients used to managing their own medicines while at home should be supported in managing their own medicines while in hospital, if appropriate. Linking the two will create a professional team to raise awareness, and I know that good work is taking place in that area. We also know that non-adherence to medicines can be a cause of hospital admissions, so it is important that we tackle it.

My hon. Friend pointed out that many patients do not realise that returned medicines cannot be reused, and he is right to highlight that. Ministers regularly receive correspondence from Members and the public about that. As my hon. Friend said, we cannot promote the reuse of returned medicines from patients. Recycling of medicines is both unethical and unsafe, as it is not possible to guarantee that any returned medicines are still of good quality. They may not have been stored correctly—medicines left too close to a radiator or in direct sunlight may deteriorate—nor is it possible for a pharmacist to guarantee quality on physical inspection alone.

The code of ethics of the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain states that, for reasons of hygiene and safety, medicines returned to a pharmacy from a patient's home, nursing home or residential home must not be supplied to any other patient. That applies similarly to donating unwanted medicines to developing countries.

Equally, while returned medicines cannot be reused, it is important, as my hon. Friend said, that people return them to their local pharmacy. All pharmacies provide services for the safe disposal of unwanted medicines. That helps to ensure that unwanted medicines are disposed of safely, not flushed down the toilet or placed in the dustbin, thereby helping to reduce harm to the environment.

I have not addressed all the points that my hon. Friend made on packaging and pack sizes, for instance, but research that we commissioned should indicate the extent to which they are a factor in preventing people, literally, from taking their medicine.

Another issue that my hon. Friend raised was over-prescribing. The National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee considered that real savings could be made through better prescribing by general practitioners—and now, of course, suitably qualified nurses and pharmacists.

Ben Chapman: I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend. I wonder whether she might respond to the point about packaging at a later date.

Ann Keen: Of course I will. My hon. Friend raised such important issues and such a variety of questions that, sadly, because of the time, I am unable to deal with them all now, so I would be happy to do that.

The National Prescribing Centre is a nationally funded NHS body that supports the NHS in England in improving the cost-effective and safe use of medicines to the benefit of patients and the service. It has produced good practice guidance on the approaches that the NHS might adopt to secure efficient and effective use of resources across primary and secondary care, including repeat prescribing. The General Medical Council has also produced good practice guidance on prescribing medicines.

Strategic health authorities and primary care trusts employ more than 1,200 prescribing advisers, often pharmacists, to encourage and secure rational and cost-effective prescribing and to provide a source of advice and support for prescribers in their area. Research indicates that the input of a pharmacist can yield £2 for every £1 invested. Many PCTs are encouraging prescribers to issue 28-day prescriptions to help reduce waste, and most GP practices have developed repeat prescribing systems that require them to review a patient's treatment at fixed intervals before issuing a new prescription. That provides an opportunity to discuss with the patient whether their treatment needs to be continued, and can help to reduce waste by stopping unnecessary treatments.

However, we continue to believe that prescribing is a matter best left to the health care professionals involved in a person's care. We therefore need to balance that with patient convenience and minimising waste, but we do not think that new regulations are the best approach. Building on the success of the better care, better value indicators on the prescribing of statins, which has already realised savings worth some £80 million a year, the Department and the NHS Institute for Innovation and Improvement are considering developing a composite indicator comprising statins, angiotensin converting enzyme inhibitors, proton pump inhibitors and generic prescribing. However, we would consider issuing guidance to the NHS to tackle waste medicines, if the research that we have commissioned provides clear data that show that such guidance would make a significant difference.

Turning to my hon. Friend's constituency, I am pleased to learn that Wirral PCT has invested in a medicines management team since 1999. It is responsible for promoting rational, safe and cost-effective prescribing, identifying and implementing areas for improvement, engaging GPs, managing the interface with secondary care prescribing, ensuring that systems are in place for the safe administration and use of medicines, and monitoring and developing community pharmacy services. The PCT has been successful in achieving year-on-year savings of more than 1 per cent. of its prescribing budget, which allows it to re-invest in patient care. The efficiency savings have driven a range of service, premises and educational developments, and I congratulate Wirral PCT on its achievements.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend acknowledges the role that pharmacies have to play in all this. I shall not mention any personal lobbying. Pharmacists, with their specific expertise in the use of medicines, can be capitalised on to tackle persistent problems relating to poor use of medicines, and the safe and effective use of medicines and associated costs.

The new contractual framework for community pharmacy supports a range of initiatives such as repeat dispensing, clinical medication reviews, and medicines use reviews to help patients get the most from their medicines, while at the same time minimising the wastage of medicines by optimising their use.

However, there remains room for improvement. Our White Paper, "Pharmacy in England: Building on strengths—delivering the future", which was published in April, sets out our proposals for encouraging patients and the NHS to make better use of medicines by achieving further progress on repeat dispensing, by improving the use of medicines and people's adherence to them, and by supporting people regarding newly prescribed medicines for a long-term condition, which is an exceptionally important area.

In particular, the White Paper suggests improvements for the MUR service, including allowing PCTs to prioritise MURs to meet their local health priorities, including health improvement, and to monitor the service more effectively. Ministers agree that the White Paper should not dictate to the service exactly how things should be done. Instead, it should allow us to move forward in the spirit of partnership with those charged with commissioning and delivering pharmacy services. We have therefore recently held several listening events around the country, which were well attended. They have helped to inform our thinking, and we will discuss our proposals in more detail with interested parties over the coming months. I am confident that my hon. Friend will contribute to that process of listening and acting.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Two o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 11 June 2008

[DR. WILLIAM MCCREA in the Chair]

Specialist Trauma Response Teams

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned. —[Mr. Roy.]

9.30 am

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): Even after 11 years, one of the joys of this job is that, every now and then, I come across an issue about which I know nothing. Somebody comes into my surgery, gives me a briefing and I go away thinking, "That's extraordinary. I had no idea that was going on." Specialist care for seriously injured people is such a subject.

A few months ago, a couple of my constituents—Phil Hyde and Ewan McMorris—briefed me about the work that they did. They said that the subject that they wanted to discuss was pre-hospital care, and I assumed that they would talk about rehabilitation, drugs, therapy or something that would prevent people from going into hospital. However, as the conversation developed, it became clear that they are providing an enormous specialist service, particularly in Hampshire. This morning, I shall go through some of the facts and figures about the service that they provide and consider how the Government can do more to support such work.

In essence, the role of those people is best described as taking the skills of an accident and emergency department out to serious accidents and injuries—most typically, a road traffic incident. The service they provide is different from that of the ambulance service, paramedics and first responders, who are now quite commonplace and whom many of us will have in our constituencies. The philosophy behind immediate care is the prevention of the deterioration of a patient in those first critical minutes between the time of an accident and before they are taken to the A and E department.

I had assumed that such a critical service would be part of the NHS, but it is not. I was surprised to discover that the service is provided by volunteers, charities and a couple of organisations that work closely in the field. The British Association for Immediate Care—BASICS—and the Mid-Anglia General Practitioner Accident Service, which is an emergency medical charity, are the major players in the service. My amazement at the service they provide, coupled with my astonishment that it was not centrally funded, meant that I decided to probe the matter and do a bit more work on the subject.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) is here because I know that she has met the individuals concerned and has taken up some of the issues on their behalf. In Hampshire, we are lucky to have the service that they provide. On average, they attend an incident between two and eight times a day. In the Hampshire area, there were 1,200 requests a year for basic doctors and, through the work the charity does and the volunteers that it has, it is able to attend 750 of those calls. There is a big demand, but the worrying statistic is that although it is good that we have volunteers, they are not able to meet all the calls made on their watch.

The work involved often relates to traffic incidents, and we know that, on average, some 3,460 traffic fatalities take place each year. We also know that trauma is one of the big causes of death in this country. The latest figures suggest that trauma remains the fourth leading cause of death in western countries, including this country. Clearly, much work needs to be done to try to reduce the number of deaths. For each trauma death that takes place there are two survivors, who often end up with a serious and permanent disability. Anything that we can do to reduce the disabilities and injuries from which such people suffer will have a big impact on their lives.

The model that we have in this country differs from the rest of Europe. For example, Germany takes a different approach to trauma care. There is a nationwide network of helicopters and road vehicles that can, in 95 per cent. of cases, get a skilled doctor to the scene of an incident within 15 minutes. We even trail behind America in relation to trauma care. The UK mortality rate for severely injured trauma patients who are alive when they reach hospital is a staggering 40 per cent. higher than that of the US.

We know that the level of trauma-related deaths is high in this country, and that other European countries and America are able to tackle the problem better. We also know that, despite the various forms of support provided by ambulances, paramedics and first responders, there is still a desperate need to have skilled consultants and doctors who are able to get out to the incident. In Hampshire, although demand for the service is high, it is funded by charities and good will.

Why is it so important to have specialists as part of the service, and what do they do that is different from first responders and paramedics? First responders would be the first to acknowledge that they are not fully medically trained and can in no way replicate the work of a specialist doctor in A and E. It is also the case that, despite the wonderful work that paramedics do, their degree course lasts just three years. Let us compare that with the training required to be a consultant. Typically, a consultant in A and E would get five to six years at medical school and then a structured 12-year training programme before becoming a consultant. That is the level of skill and knowledge required to treat the most severe incidents of trauma.

The particular specialist skill needed relates to the airways and breathing of patients who have had severe head injuries. Paramedics are not trained to clear the airway or use the necessary drugs and anaesthetics in the treatment of those injuries. In many cases, paramedics are legally prevented from doing so because they are unable to administer the drugs. All the evidence that I have seen suggests that the critical area that an individual needs to have treated at an incident is around the airway, and that anaesthetics and drugs need to be issued. None of those who currently attend incidents are able to treat that specialist injury. However, the specialist consultants from A and E departments can do so, and we are trying to ensure that more of them can carry out that particular work, often at the roadside.

A fair bit of work and research has been done on the subject. The most recent report was in 2007 when the National Confidential Enquiry into Patient Outcome and Death produced a report entitled, "Trauma: Who Cares?" The report takes a general look at how we handle a situation when there is an accident leading to trauma, and considers what happens in the first few moments after an incident. It states:

[Mr. Mark Oaten]

"The current structure of prehospital management is insufficient to meet the needs of the severely injured patient. There is a high incidence of failed intubation and a high incidence of patients arriving at hospital with a partially or completely obstructed airway. Change is urgently required to provide a system that reliably provides a clear airway with good oxygenation and control of ventilation."

The report highlights the particular specialist skills needed at the scene of an accident. In the study, NCEPOD produced an analysis stating that 60 per cent. of patients whom it looked at received a standard of care that was less than good practice. It also states:

"Many of these clinical issues were related to the lack of seniority and experience of the staff involved in the immediate management of these patients."

Again, the critical issue is seniority and people having the skills to tackle breathing and airway problems.

It is not just NCEPOD that has looked at the issue; the Royal College of Surgeons has also raised concerns in a number of studies. Initially, in 2000, the college called for defined trauma systems comprised of major trauma centres to be established in each region. It describes—in its words—

"the lack of political will"

to tackle the issue. It revisited the subject in 2006 and reported little progress or improvement. Its analysis is that the likelihood of dying from injuries has remained static since 1994 despite great improvements in trauma care, training and education. There are not many areas of the health service in which things have remained static since 1994, certainly under the Labour Government—I welcome some of their investments. With many of the indicators, one can see that the advancement of knowledge has been matched by improved outcomes, but this area has remained static since 1994.

Last night, the RCS e-mailed me with a further update on the issue, in which it raised more concerns. It welcomes the fact that volunteers and charities are putting provisions in place throughout the country, but says that coverage is patchy. It describes a postcode lottery and says that there is great inequality in access to and provision of pre-hospital critical care. As a consequence, there are preventable pre-hospital and early-hospital deaths that could have been averted had there been access to appropriate services.

It is troubling that the RCS is saying that we could save lives if we had that kind of system in place across the country. In its note, it estimated that a national system of 24-hour access to specialist physicians who could go out to incidents would probably require an additional 200 specialist practitioners, who would need to be funded. I do not have more accurate figures than that estimate, but if those are the kind of figures involved and if it would have a dramatic impact by cutting the number of deaths, as the RCS says and as other evidence suggests, it would be a small price to pay.

Air ambulances are critical to the ability to save lives after a traumatic incident; however, there are contradictions. I understand that, in London, daytime provision of the air ambulance is centrally funded, but that the evening service switches to charitable funding. There was a debate on air ambulances in Westminster Hall in February for which the RCS did a lot of work. It said how important the role of air ambulances is, but it was extremely concerned that it is left to charitable trusts and individual primary care trusts to fund them. The RCS argues strongly that it is excellent value for money to have an air ambulance.

Another issue that the RCS has raised is the provision of helipads close to accident and emergency departments. There are many examples—including one in Southampton, close to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey—of the ridiculous situation in which the air ambulance is able to get to the scene of a trauma quickly, but is then unable to land near the hospital and has to land a six or seven-minute ambulance journey away from it, so an ambulance has to go to the air ambulance and bring the patient to the hospital. After the air ambulance has provided such a quality service, having got to the scene quickly, it is enormously frustrating to the professionals involved that an additional journey is needed at the end.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (UKIP): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's flow, because he is being extremely eloquent in showing how much he cares about this important issue. I congratulate him on securing the debate. Is he aware that when the new Queen's hospital opened in east London, with a specialist neurosurgical centre, the local council placed restrictions on the landing of air ambulances delivering patients at certain times of day? That was an unhelpful interpretation of the balance of inconvenience by the various players in that decision.

Mr. Oaten: I was not aware of that, and I find it extraordinary that a local council representing potential patients would take that decision. Certainly, my conversations with the chief executive of Southampton hospital suggest that he would not have that kind of difficulty with Southampton city council. He thinks that the population would strongly welcome hearing the sound of a helicopter and would find it reassuring.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I have written to Mark Hackett, the chief executive of Southampton University Hospitals NHS Trust. He is keen on having a helipad, but pointed out that funding for it is not available and that there would have to be some sort of public appeal to raise money for it. Given that we are talking about something that could save lives, does my hon. Friend think it right that local members of the public should have to dip into their pockets yet again?

Mr. Oaten: I had a similar conversation with Mark Hackett, who told me that the cost, on its figures, would be about £1 million. He hoped that it might be possible to reduce that cost by putting a helipad on top of a building and incorporating that into ongoing rebuilding at the hospital site. I am no engineer or scientist, but one would think that reasonably easy to achieve. It is breathtaking that such a service should have to depend on charity in today's modern world, particularly as it would cover a region with a radius of about 150 to 200 miles. It would provide a quality service covering the Isle of Man and going through to Dorset, which is an enormous area. One would think, therefore, that it would attract public funding.

It is not for me to tell any of the three political parties what would be an eye-catching issue at the next general election—I am not standing at the next election, so I do not mind too much—but I should think that any party that commits to introducing 10 helipads across the country to ensure that individuals can get straight into an accident and emergency department would have a simple, popular message with a particularly low cost. It is extraordinarily odd that we leave the funding of air ambulances and their work to the good will of volunteers and charities. I hope that the Minister will comment on that.

Bob Spink: But will the hon. Gentleman accept that there are four political parties, please?

Mr. Oaten: Four, five, six or seven—anyone is entitled to put forward the policy, but it would be wonderful if the Minister prevented other parties from doing so by announcing something today.

Let me address what is the best way forward with funding. I totally understand that there are demands on Government funding and I am reluctant to say to a Minister, "Come on, cough up," because so many areas have to be funded. I know from parliamentary questions on this issue that the Minister and his colleagues have said, "Look, fantastic work is being done and we totally recognise that this is providing a real benefit to the health service, but it is for local PCTs to decide whether to fund it." That is a cop-out, because we know the pressures that local PCTs are under. Is it right to say that we are going to leave it to the lottery of whether a PCT is able to support such work? People throughout the country—certainly my constituents and, I am sure, those of other hon. Members—want the reassurance that they will get the best-quality support if they are involved in a major trauma anywhere in the country, but that is currently left to good will and chance.

I hope that the Government will consider this issue further and do more work on it. I am encouraged by some of the statements that have come from Ministers so far, who have at least acknowledged that there is more work to do. Lord Darzi said:

> "We have taken on board the recommendations of NCEPOD, not necessarily just regarding pre-hospital admission. We also need to have, and define for the first time, dedicated regional trauma centres. It is the one area where there is clear evidence that centralisation of services, with adequate competencies at the site of receiving hospitals, will significantly impact on the quality of care."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 January 2008; Vol. 697, c. 630.]

I could not agree more and I hope that the Minister present agrees with his colleague. With that in mind, I ask him to confirm whether he plans to meet the authors of the NCEPOD report. In a written answer in April, he told me that officials were arranging for a further meeting to take place, so I hope that progress has been made with people's diaries; indeed, the meeting may have taken place.

According to a written answer last year from one of the Minister's colleagues, who has moved on to the Home Office, the Government acknowledged the work of the RCS in this area and were hoping to do more work and have meetings with it. It would be helpful to know whether that work has been done and whether the Government have made an assessment of the RCS reports on trauma.

I was amazed to discover that the whole area of specialist trauma response did not exist as part of the NHS. Having met the surgeons involved, I am convinced that, despite the good work of paramedics, the ambulance service and first responders, there is a very big gap—the ability of high-quality experts with high levels of training to reach the scene of an incident quickly and provide the drugs, skills and airway support that definitely could, based on studies done so far, save lives. Linked to that is the question of a decent, funded air ambulance service. We need to put the two elements together. If the Government were prepared to move on this and to put some funding in—not necessarily fund the whole project, but put in some match funding—we could make a significant difference to the number of people who are dying unnecessarily in traffic accidents and as a result of other serious injuries.

9.51 am

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I just want to add a footnote to the excellent speech made by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten)—my parliamentary neighbour. As you may have seen, Dr. McCrea, a high percentage of Hampshire MPs are present.

I pay tribute to the work of Dr. Phil Hyde and the team in Hampshire for raising the profile of this issue as well as providing the help that the hon. Gentleman described. Like him, I was not aware of the service until my constituent, Dr. Louisa Chan, who lives in Whitchurch, wrote to me. She is one of 19 volunteer doctors and one consultant nurse in the county who act as volunteers working for BASICS—in her case, after doing 56 hours of full-time work for the NHS. She uses her own car with a blue light in responding to call-outs. As the hon. Gentleman said, at the moment, the team can respond to about half the number of call-outs. Of course, they are not called out every time that an ambulance is summoned; they are called out only to the more serious emergencies where their skills could make the difference between life and death. I pay tribute to those volunteers. They were very active following the train crash at Ufton Nervet a few years ago; they were on the scene very quickly.

I want to put this issue in a slightly broader context. The hon. Gentleman touched on the fact that one could argue that this is not the only service that ought to be mainstream NHS but is slightly at arm's length from it. I suppose that the best example is the hospice movement, which one could argue ought to be mainstream NHS. It started off in this country totally independent, run by voluntary organisations, but it is now moving more towards the mainstream NHS; the hospice movement is receiving more support. In Hampshire, we have fantastic hospices: Naomi House, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and the Countess of Brecknock hospice and St. Michael's hospice in my own. That is an example of a service that started outside the NHS but is gradually being absorbed into the bloodstream, if I can put it in that way.

[Sir George Young]

The other example, which the hon. Gentleman touched on, is the air ambulance, and it is quite a good parallel with the BASICS service. Until last year, the only local air ambulance service was the one in Thames valley, which I do not think has ever received a penny of public money. We now have our own in Hampshire—the Hampshire and Isle of Wight air ambulance—which, again, I think receives no public money at all. One could say that that is slightly odd. The police have helicopters. No one has ever argued that the police should have a whip-round for police helicopters. They are an integral part of the police service, but specialist trauma response is another emergency service and, for some reason, its helicopters have to be funded in a totally different way. It is not immediately clear why that should be so.

Then we have BASICS, the service to which the hon. Gentleman referred. One could argue that the case for absorption of that service is stronger. With hospices and helicopters, there is something visible for which people can raise money, but for this service, there is nothing visible at all. It is an unseen part of the service. Therefore, one could argue that the case for total absorption and integration is stronger. It is very difficult to say that it is an acceptable risk for patients to rely on off-duty volunteers, possibly to save their lives.

Mr. Oaten: I am sorry to intervene so soon. I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his speech on this issue. He reminds me about the ridiculous situation in which some consultants are on duty, operating and working in the accident and emergency department, waiting for emergencies to come in, and their pager goes off, asking them suddenly to switch to become a volunteer and go out. They cannot do so, because they are working in the hospital, and they have to wait for the patient to come in, knowing that if they had been able to go out as a volunteer, they perhaps could have helped to save a life. What better example is there of the fact that the service should be integrated?

Sir George Young: There probably is no better example, and the hon. Gentleman makes the point very well.

Last year, the Hampshire service received the Queen's award for voluntary service. I commend it for that. The hon. Gentleman referred to the National Confidential Enquiry into Patient Outcome and Death, which highlighted the inadequacy of out-of-hospital care. It said:

"The current structure of pre-hospital management is insufficient to meet the needs of the severely injured patient."

I agree. It seems to me that the objective should be to integrate the service that the hon. Gentleman has described into a properly funded pre-hospital service, with doctors and paramedics working together as a team.

The debate calls for a ministerial response, and I am delighted to see the Minister in his place. He can say one of a number of things. First, he could say, "These are wonderful people. I applaud what they do, and I would like to provide this life-saving service as part of the mainstream NHS, but the resources are not there, so we will carry on as we are." Or he could say, "The case has been made. We recognise that, in most other countries, this service is an integral part of a national health service. We accept the case. We will make this a priority, and either move ahead with earmarked additional resources or ask people to do it within existing budgets." Or I suppose that he could say that he wants to reach the same destination by another route; he wants progressively to upskill the paramedics, reduce the call-out times, put better equipment in ambulances and implement similar solutions. I am not sure whether that would achieve the same objective. The paramedics are fine. For the average call-out, they have the necessary skills, but as the hon. Gentleman said, they simply are not trained to the level of doctors.

The Minister might like to respond to this point. The new GP contract contains a provision for a national enhanced service for immediate care, but as I understand it, almost no primary care trusts have commissioned one, so there is a provision, but it is not being activated. This is what we need to know from the Minister. What is the philosophy? What is the policy? Should the service be a mainstream part of the NHS? If so, how will we get there, and as the hon. Member for Winchester said, who will pay for it?

I have a final point about the landing site in our area. The paradox at the moment is that, when someone called out under BASICS gets to the scene, there is almost always an ambulance there as well. If an air ambulance is summoned and takes the patient to Southampton, they then have to go by ambulance to the hospital, as the hon. Gentleman explained. The same ambulance that attended the initial incident then goes to the helipad, so there is no gain in time at all from using the helicopter. Given that paradoxical situation, there is an urgent need to make some progress with a more accessible helipad for patients who are taken to Southampton hospital. I am sure that the Minister will respond as sympathetically as he can, and I commend the hon. Member for Winchester again for raising the profile of this important but neglected subject.

9.59 am

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (UKIP): First, I must declare an interest: my son is a consultant neurosurgeon.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on securing a debate on this important issue. He raised some interesting points. We are fortunate today to have an excellent Front-Bench team, and I am delighted to see the Minister in his place, as I know him to be a caring man. The Government have invested much more in health over the past decade, and I congratulate them on that. However, our constituents do not see a proportionate improvement in health outcomes. We are debating an area in which a little extra spending might give results that people would welcome; I ask the Minister to consider that point.

The hon. Member for Winchester mentioned the different approaches taken by various countries, and we clearly need to review the way in which we provide immediate, on-the-spot care for trauma patients. The hon. Gentleman focused on the first few moments of care. I want to extend that to the first few hours. He mentioned the importance of breathing, clearing airways and similar issues, but I want to focus on head injuries.

Research and experience indicate that there should be no more than four hours between injury and operation if there are expanding mass lesions, such as extradural or acute subdural haematomas. Only 20 per cent. of patients with severe head injuries are treated within those four hours. The problem is not the one hour leading to the CT scan. That is usually met; the response is pretty good. The problem is largely with the inter-hospital transfer—from the hospital that first receives the patient to the specialist hospital capable of dealing with severe head injuries. That is where the problem lies.

The ambulance service and the hospital management team probably consider that, because the patient is already in hospital and in a secure and safe environment, the need to move the patient to another specialist hospital within the four hours is not so important—the priority is lost or diminished. That perception is one reason why the four-hour limit is not met in 80 per cent. of cases. That should be a top priority. If that limit can be met, the outcome for the patient is so much better. However, when it is not met, the outcome becomes worse as time goes by. Many patients die who could otherwise have been saved; and others suffer severe and permanent disabilities who otherwise would not suffer them. Although it is important to treat a collapsed lung, once the patient is in hospital it will not kill them. However, a head injury can kill or cause permanent damage. We need to focus on that specific but small issue. I am sure that the Minister is listening carefully.

A good development that the Government are pursuing is the specialist trauma centre. Patients suffering multiple traumas are taken there in the first instance rather than to a general hospital. That is extremely helpful, because it does away with the inter-hospital transfer. The four-hour limit is more likely be met, and the outcome for patients with severe head injuries and other traumas will therefore be much better. I welcome and support the Government's move on specialist trauma centres.

The hon. Member for Winchester spoke of funding, and I shall follow him. One reason why the UK Independence party wants to repatriate the £15 billion cost of our membership of the EU is to invest more in specialist services, such as immediate trauma care and health care generally. That is another sound UKIP policy.

10.4 am

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on securing this debate. I have been trying to secure a debate on the subject.

My hon. Friend mentioned Dr. Phil Hyde. Dr. Hyde has also spoken to me. He is clearly passionate about the subject, and there is a real issue over patient safety. I was taken aback and horrified by what I heard in my conversation with him. Before that meeting, despite shadowing ambulance teams on a number of occasions, I had no inkling that, if I were to be seriously injured in a road traffic accident, my prognosis would be severely affected by whether a voluntary doctor happened to be available. That is scandalous.

The 2007 report by the National Confidential Enquiry into Patient Outcome and Death entitled "Trauma: Who Cares?" has been mentioned. It concluded that the current structure of pre-hospital management is insufficient to meet the needs of the severely injured patient. It said that there is currently a high incidence of failed intubation and of people arriving at hospital with a partially or completely obstructed airway. It went on to say:

"Change is urgently required to provide a system that reliably provides a clear airway with good oxygenation and control of ventilation. This may be through the provision of personnel with the ability to provide anaesthesia and intubation in the prehospital phase or the use of alternative airway devices."

That was highlighted as something that needed to be addressed by ambulance trusts, but it is clearly not happening.

Research shows that patients who die from severe injuries often do so within the first hour after the accident. In the United Kingdom, that hour has usually passed by the time the patient reaches hospital. However, sending a BASICS doctor to the scene of an accident is the nearest one can get to sending the hospital to the patient. BASICS doctors will often perform a specialist procedure, known as rapid sequence intubation, to help to stabilise the patient. Once the patient is stabilised, the doctor will be able to judge which is the best hospital for the patient.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) mentioned the specialist trauma centres that are being introduced and said that the outcome for patients will be much improved if they can be stabilised and taken to an appropriate specialist unit. If there is no doctor on the scene, such patients suffer a double whammy. They will not have been stabilised at the scene, so it is often decided to take them to hospital quickly, but the nearest hospital may not be the most appropriate. We all know that some hospitals excel at certain aspects and some at others. Many patients are therefore not given the greatest chance of recovery.

As someone who has probably overdosed on episodes of "Casualty", I was surprised to learn that accident and emergency consultants are not generally in the business of donning hard hats and bright protective clothing and going to the scene of accidents. I asked, "Isn't that what happens?" I was told that they could not leave the casualty department, although some are BASICS doctors in their spare time. Not everyone who works in the casualty department is suited to working on the road.

In the casualty department, there is plenty of light, the equipment is where it is needed and there is space to operate on the patient. At the scene of a car crash, one has to work with the noise of the machinery and the fire engines in a confined space; it is a completely different environment. I understand that not everyone can operate easily under those conditions. Those who do so are a special breed.

Most of the doctors who provide the BASICS service are fully employed in the NHS—sometimes in A and E, as I said, but often in other disciplines, such as intensive care or surgery. BASICS doctors are particularly valuable in providing complex airway management procedures and stabilising patients in a critical condition.

BASICS doctors work closely with the ambulance service when a multi-agency response is required locally or when additional skills and qualifications are needed. They are usually called when a paramedic decides that he or she does not have the training to deal with an incident. The paramedic who arrives at the scene will often call the BASICS doctor, although in the case of a fatal crash, the control centre will sometimes call them out.

[Sandra Gidley]

An industrial accident involving a worker who has become trapped in machinery is a good example of what happens. The ambulance service would work alongside the fire service to co-ordinate the rescue. BASICS could supplement the skill set available at the scene by providing a medical doctor with the necessary extra skills. If necessary, the doctor may use a surgical procedure to extricate the patient, although that is obviously a last resort.

I know Hampshire best, and it is where I have the best figures from, so I will use it as an example. As the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said, the county has 19 volunteer doctors and one consultant nurse for a population of more than 1 million. Those BASICS staff work on their own time and carry a pager that is activated by the ambulance control in Winchester. Once paged, they must travel to the scene of the accident in their own cars, using blue lights and sirens. BASICS staff must provide not only their own transport, but all their own equipment. It can cost up to £25,000 fully to equip one of those doctors. Frequently, some of the money comes from the doctors' own pockets, although staff do not really have much time for fundraising between doing their day job in the NHS and volunteering in their spare time.

Let me give a few statistics. In Hampshire, BASICS doctors are usually called out between two and eight times a day. There were about 1,200 calls last year, and BASICS doctors managed to attend 750 of them. We can only hazard a guess about what difference they might have made in the 450 cases in which no such response was possible.

Perhaps I can give a snapshot of what the BASICS staff do. In January, they responded to 58 calls, although I do not know how many they were unable to respond to. Two thirds of the calls that they responded to involved motor vehicle collisions. The others involved falls, burns and machinery accidents. In 16 cases, the doctor was required to give anaesthetic drugs. In 10 cases, they provided advanced wound management and life-saving minor surgery, as well as injecting drugs into the aorta. I mentioned the importance of admitting patients to the most appropriate hospital, and 26 of the 58 patients had their destination altered, because of the knowledge and expertise of the BASICS doctors.

Things vary throughout the country. In Sunderland, which has one of the best survival rates, the death rate for people coming into the unit is 2.9 per cent.—half the national average. Bosses from City Hospitals Sunderland NHS Foundation Trust say that that is due to high investment in staff and facilities. Interestingly, the trust has also introduced a new trauma response team, and the figures speak for themselves.

It might also be worth mentioning London, which seems to have more advanced provision than many areas of the country. Specialist trauma teams are funded by, and travel with, the London air ambulance service. As my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester said, however, the air ambulance stops flying at night for some reason, and some of the provision then becomes voluntary. I am told that there are also only 15 BASICS doctors in London, covering a population of 8 million people. The moral of the story appears to be that, if someone is going to be involved in a serious accident, they should make sure that it happens in London during the day, so that they have the best chance of receiving specialist care.

Clearly, there are many political priorities, and I can understand why there is not a huge patient lobby banging on the door to raise this issue. The Government could therefore quietly ignore the problem or dismiss it with the old chestnut that, "This is nothing to do with us. We're trying to get these decisions taken locally." However, we need to take a more strategic approach to determining which specialist services are provided and where. People do not have accidents along primary care trust boundaries, and the issue is a real example of a postcode lottery—I hate using that term, but I have never seen a better example of one.

The fact remains that investment in this volunteer service can save money in the long term, because patients will have better outcomes and be less likely to need intensive post-trauma support packages or access to other benefits. The Government presumably have an interest in keeping their citizens safe and well.

I want now to summarise the national inquiry. The inquiry noted that the standard of care received by 60 per cent. of patients was less than what was judged to be good practice, and deficiencies were identified in organisational and clinical aspects of care. Difficulties were highlighted in identifying patients with an injury severity score of more than 16. Again, if such things are done properly, it will optimise the use of precious resources. Problems were identified not only with immediate pre-hospital care, but with trauma team responses generally and with the seniority of the staff involved once someone actually got into hospital. People were frequently not seen by a consultant within the first 12 hours, even though they were probably among the most injured patients in the country. Problems were also identified with immediate in-hospital care and the provision of suitably qualified staff at all times of day and night.

The report made a number of recommendations. It identified the need for designated trauma centres, and I acknowledge that we have had some movement on that. It also asked for a verification process to be developed to guarantee the quality of care. The report referred to the pre-hospital management of airways, which I have mentioned. It stated that a trauma team should be available 24 hours a day, seven days a week. It also noted that a consultant should be the team leader for the management of severely injured patients. The report also made recommendations about the nature of CT scanning once people were in hospital.

As has been highlighted, this is not a new problem. One of the most depressing things that I read was that the Royal College of Surgeons had looked at this issue in 1988 and 2006 and said that there had been no progress. It noted:

"most of the improvement in the outcome of these patients occurred prior to 1995, with no further significant change occurring between 1994 and 2000."

That is quite a damning indictment of what we are doing—or not doing.

Also pertinent to the debate is the NHS emergency planning guidance, which contains principles for effective emergency health planning. The chief executive of each NHS organisation is responsible for ensuring that it has a major incident plan in place. Given what we have heard about trauma response, it is somewhat ironic that that major incident response could apparently also hinge on the availability of volunteer doctors.

The situation that I have outlined is not sustainable in the long term. I hope that the Minister is sufficiently persuaded by what he has heard today to commit to improving services. Put simply, if any of us or our constituents ever need trauma care, we surely deserve the best.

10.19 am

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Let me declare an interest at the outset as a trustee of the new Essex and Herts Air Ambulance Trust and a patron of St. Francis hospice in my constituency. I will say a little about hospices later.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on his passionate and articulate speech on this important subject. He raised so many issues in his short contribution that it will be difficult to address them all, but I hope that the Minister will deal with many of them and perhaps some of those raised by other hon. Members.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) spoke about the hospice movement. There is an obvious link between that movement and the sort of voluntary medical care that we have been describing. My right hon. Friend alluded to the fact that the hospice movement is being drawn closer to the NHS, because of their funding streams; but one of the biggest concerns of my local hospice is that the tail is starting to wag the dog. The NHS is starting to fund it and tell it how to provide care, which is completely against the way that the hospice movement was set up. That relates to some of my concerns about the topic that we are debating.

I, like many other hon. Members, have been contacted by Dr. Phil Hyde of BASICS. I am due to meet him in the next few weeks. I have also been contacted by other groups, such as the Sussex and Surrey immediate medical care scheme, and by Dr. Alan Jones at Mid-Anglia General Practitioner Accident Service—another excellent voluntary organisation. One of the most telling things that the hon. Member for Winchester mentioned was the figure of 750 responses to 1,200 requests. That is a fantastic response for a voluntary organisation; but as a former member of the emergency services who has attended road traffic accidents while we waited for response units, I know that it is a frightening experience for the patient and the other emergency services when they do not know who is coming and whether there will be a response. As the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) said, that is not new.

I have been out of the fire service for some 17 years, but in the 11 years that I was in it, I never once trained alongside an ambulance paramedic crew. We do not train together. What goes on out there is frightening. When people arrive at an incident, the training clicks in, but very often it is individual training. I was out recently with a crew from the London ambulance service, and I asked them when they last trained with other emergency services—the police or particularly the fire brigade, with whom they would go to RTAs. The gentleman I spoke to had served 20 years, and he had not trained in that way. I asked my own local fire crew, green watch at Hemel fire station, which is a joint station with the ambulance trust, "When was the last time you trained with ambulance paramedics?" and was told, "We don't sir; we ask but it does not happen." The pressure of time, particularly on the ambulance service and paramedics, is crucial.

An aspect that we need to examine, which has been alluded to in the debate, is best practice, if that is what we want to call it, and the lack of a defined system throughout the country. I, like the hon. Member for Romsey, do not like using the term "postcode lottery" for the pot luck situation in which where people live affects the emergency services that they may need to use, but I do not know a better way to describe it. People in one PCT are likely to get better care than people in others. I, too, have been to Sunderland and Newcastle, where they have a wonderful system, but I have also been to other parts of the country where things are much more difficult.

It is best to listen to the experts as well as to politicians. A recent report by the Royal College of Surgeons shows that a third of all deaths from trauma are avoidable. That is in the 21st century NHS, with £110 billion going into it, and the vast majority of those cases involve people under the age of 44. The largest cause of death of people under 44 in this country is trauma—road traffic accidents. Our lifestyles mean that those incidents will occur. So, surely, we should have a level playing field across the country for the care and expertise to be provided by the emergency services when they arrive.

I have also read reports that say that consultants are needed to lead trauma teams at as many incidents as possible. The problem is that, as many hon. Members know, we have a shortage of consultants, particularly accident and emergency consultants, and as those pressures mount, it is very difficult for any PCT or acute trust to decide to take a consultant out of A and E and send them to an incident. I should very much like to discuss during this debate how we could increase paramedics' skills. I fully admit that in the past decade the skills of our paramedics, who serve us wonderfully well, have hugely increased.

I was a paramedic in Her Majesty's armed forces many years ago. A paramedic means something completely different in the armed forces. I left the Army in 1982, with three years' training as a paramedic for use on the streets of Northern Ireland, where we dealt with huge problems, with airways in particular. We were trained in tracheotomy. The most basic Army paramedic had done a tracheotomy course before being deployed with troops. When I left the armed forces and joined the Essex county fire and rescue service, I was asked to take a first aid course: I had three years' paramedic training. I would love to say that things have changed and that we have better paramedical or even first aid skills in our emergency, particularly fire, services. In some parts of the country that is true but mostly it is not.

Will the Minister think about the skills base of our armed forces? We learned this weekend that three of our brave Paras from the 2nd Battalion the Parachute Regiment, had died on active service in Afghanistan. However, many members of our armed forces who are injured on active service survive injuries that they would not have survived 10 or 20 years ago. Is it a consultant from accident and emergency who attends them in the field when they have been blown to smithereens or a consultant A and E surgeon who treats them when they have been shot while in the field? No. It is a paramedic: highly skilled paramedics who understand and can do the work there and then, at the incident, to keep someone alive long enough to enable the experts to get hold of them.

[Mike Penning]

We have made enormous progress with the skills of paramedics and with air ambulances throughout the country, but that is sporadic, with respect to skills and qualifications. That is something that we can consider, because we need to think carefully about how money is spent in the NHS. As well as using the extra skills of the volunteers who have been mentioned—many of whom tell me, interestingly, that they have retired from the NHS and keep their hand in by using such skills—I should like to examine the skills base of our paramedics.

We have heard about the ambulance service this morning. It was a great honour for me to be asked to be a trustee of the new Herts air ambulance service—a completely charitable organisation, which was set up because Essex air ambulance was covering Hertfordshire as a charitable organisation. That is fundamentally wrong: the Essex air ambulance was in Hertfordshire, and was not giving cover to the people who had raised funds for it, so we worked together on the situation.

Alongside my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Grant Shapps), I sat in on some of the meetings with the PCT, ambulance trust and other bodies, and I could not believe how difficult it was to agree what sort of ambulance we should have. Should it have a paramedic on board, and who would pay for that? Should it have a consultant? Should it have a trauma team? Should it be just a lift helicopter, which goes straight to the incident and, once the patient has been stabilised, is up and away to the nearest major trauma unit?

I praise the Government for initiating major trauma units. The Minister knows that I am concerned about accident and emergency and acute services being penalised, because of money going elsewhere. A and E departments are closing, not least in my constituency. However, I could not believe the lack of willingness at the meetings that I attended to say, "This is a voluntary organisation, raising money to help local people, so let us sit down and help them, rather than come up with lots of reasons why what they propose should not happen." I understand from other air ambulance trusts around the country that that is not new. The availability of ambulances is a completely ad hoc situation.

I was astonished by what the hon. Member for Winchester said about helipads. We had a short conversation about it before we came into the Chamber. To use another military example, it is possible to put a helipad down nigh on anywhere in an emergency, if necessary. Two people—one person—can lay a helipad and make sure that the windsock goes up, the helipad markers are down and there is a certain amount of space.

Frankly, it is ridiculous in the 21st century that someone who is so seriously injured that they need to be casevac'd by helicopter should be put back in an ambulance to be driven to the A and E department. I hope that the Minister will look into that and give assurances to the Chamber that, if it is taking place, it will be stopped. It cannot be what our constituents deserve. We must consider how our communities can work together better for our constituents—whether the voluntary sector, PCTs, which in some areas are under extreme financial pressure, or acute trusts, which are also under pressure financially and because they are trying to centralise services. With something so serious, Ministers must get away from saying, here in London, "This is nothing to do with us. It is a matter for PCTs and localisation."

The other day, I asked a very simple parliamentary question about which services should be available at a hospital advertising an A and E department—not a minor injury unit, a surgery centre or a polyclinic. Driving around my town, like most of my constituents, one will see signs for the hospital with "A&E" written underneath. In response, I was told that it is matter for local PCTs. That should not be the case for a question as acute as which hospital someone is taken to when critically ill. There must be a set plan for what is available throughout the country when dealing with major trauma. In my case, I took my daughter to the A and E department at my local hospital, only to be told that it could not take her, because it does not do paediatrics and has no children's facilities. Naturally, because she was very ill, it said that it would look after her as best it could and then move her to the Watford hospital.

The least that our constituents deserve is for the Government to set out centrally a basic template of what services should be available throughout England and Wales—I realise that such responsibility is devolved in Scotland—so that all of us, no matter where we live in the country, get the best possible provision that the NHS can provide.

10.33 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on raising the important question of how the NHS deals with trauma, which is an issue of interest to many hon. Members. I also welcome the valuable work of all those who work within the British Association for Immediate Care, to whom I am sure that all hon. Members present are deeply grateful. I am also sure that all hon. Members share my desire to see NHS services deal effectively with severely injured patients, and to give them the support and treatment that they need. I agree that trauma care is a serious issue on which the NHS has not performed as well as it might have done in the past.

The issue is about not only how best the NHS can deal with seriously injured patients, but who is best placed to make detailed decisions on staffing and the organisation of services. These debates often tease out the tension between the desire to devolve more powers and decision making to local and regional levels, which all political parties represented here are signed up to, and the need to explore whether there should be a stronger national framework—again, that has been well illustrated in this debate.

The Government believe that, as the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) just suggested, we should give strategic direction—a national framework, if hon. Members like—to public services. However, in the end, it is for local and regional health bodies to determine the best organisational arrangements to ensure that the right people are in the right place at the right time to look after patients appropriately.

Mike Penning: I agree that the basic infrastructure for deciding where people should be taken must be a matter for local authorities. However, the question of what type of care is available must be for central Government diktat, otherwise we will continue the postcode lottery that affects the NHS today.

Mr. Bradshaw: The idea that the decision on what is available, and where, should be for central Government diktat is very interesting coming from the hon. Gentleman, and I might bring it up in future debates, if he is suggesting that we are being too dirigiste. However, I shall elaborate on my arguments in a moment.

The hon. Member for Winchester has rightly pointed to last year's report on trauma care from the National Confidential Enquiry into Patient Outcome and Death, which stated that every year between 3,000 and 4,000 severely injured people are admitted to hospital in the UK, so the majority of hospitals see fewer than one severely injured patient per week. The report found that hospitals that saw more patients had better outcomes, as they were more used to dealing with challenging cases. The NCEPOD report recommended the establishment of regional, specialist units and the development of protocols to ensure, for example, that ambulances take patients to the most suitable centre, bypassing others that are nearer, where it makes clinical sense. It also made recommendations on the care that should be available to patients before arrival at hospital. When it was published, the Government welcomed that report, and we will take forward its recommendations.

The NHS is already improving services provided by ambulance staff at the scene of such incidents and accidents. As the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead has rightly pointed out, there is an interesting contrast between the improved performance of the military medical services, in the field abroad, where we have seen dramatic improvements in survival and recovery rates among armed service personnel after severe injury, which has not been replicated in civilian trauma treatment. We are very keen to learn the lessons from that. He was also absolutely right to stress the important role of paramedics, who, I am informed, already do a lot of work in unblocking windpipes, for example, which I think that he acknowledged. There could be an issue about the delivery of anaesthetics, which might require doctors being called in from elsewhere. However, we are certainly keen to learn as much as we can from the experience of the armed services, and I have already asked my officials to look into that.

Mike Penning: I am sure that the Minister realises that many of those skilled military medics are actually NHS employees and members of the Territorial Army, who do a fantastic job for our armed forces when they deploy with their TA units.

Mr. Bradshaw: Absolutely. However, it is also important, when we talk about the respective experiences of the armed forces and the civilian health service—this touches on a point that the hon. Gentleman has raised about rules and regulations for the use of helicopters—to acknowledge that different health and safety parameters can apply to armed forces and civilian services.

Mr. Oaten: The Army point is interesting. I am not an expert, but my understanding is that NHS consultants who work in accident and emergency departments often work in Afghanistan or Iraq. Perhaps one of the reasons for the improvements relates to the lesson about BASICS. It may be not the trained paramedics, but the consultants working in the field who are making the difference.

Mr. Bradshaw: We are drifting away from the subject of the debate into another important area. We are acutely aware of the benefits of the cross-fertilisation of experience between the NHS and the military health services. In fact, the Government recently published a paper asking all trusts to encourage their staff to join the TA and to gain experience in the field. The hon. Gentleman is right—the more experience that staff can gain, the better.

The other very important development under way is the next-stage review, under the auspices of my noble Friend, Lord Darzi, who published his report on the future of health services in London about a year ago. I am sure that hon. Members who are acquainted with that report will acknowledge that it recommended the acceleration of improvements for a range of care, including trauma care. The Government support that proposal and expect the London PCTs to agree their forward programme on it tomorrow.

As part of Lord Darzi's national, next-stage review, we have been holding working groups of local clinicians and others in all England's other strategic health authorities to consider clinical evidence across all areas of health care, including trauma. Those groups have identified what they believe to be the best models of trauma care for patients. Each SHA has now published its vision for the future of health care in its region, based on the recommendations of those working groups. Those visions include improvements to services for seriously injured patients, for example, through the development of specialised centres for the treatment of major trauma to improve outcomes for patients and save lives.

I was interested to read the response, which inspired this debate, from BASICS to last year's NCEPOD report. It states:

> "The public, patients, politicians, managers and the professions need to understand that better outcomes in major trauma are more likely in units staffed by personnel undertaking sufficient throughput and with all relevant specialties to hand. Of necessity this mandates greater regionalisation of services and patients travelling that little bit further to hospital."

I suggest that that presents a challenge to all politicians who regularly come under pressure from political campaigns to fight to preserve every service that is provided in every local general hospital. It is quite clear from the evidence, which has been widely acknowledged in the debate, that a move to more regional trauma centres will save lives. I hope that when we have such controversies in future, the hon. Members who have spoken today will support their local and regional health bodies and the Government, when we make such a case.

Mr. Oaten: I am happy to set an example and say that I am comfortable with making the case to my constituents in Winchester that some things should happen not at Winchester hospital but in Southampton. If I had an accident, I would much rather go to Southampton. Surely the point is that if I am going to a specialist centre, I want to get there quickly. I am all for specialist centres, but only if people can get there quickly.

Mr. Bradshaw: I hope that hon. Members who are facing re-election at the next election are prepared to display similar courage when it comes to the reorganisation of health services in their local area. [Interruption.]

Dr. McCrea (in the Chair): Order. I would appreciate it if whoever is responsible would stop their mobile phone ringing.

Mr. Bradshaw: I want to update the hon. Member for Winchester and other hon. Members present, most of whom represent constituencies in the South Central strategic health authority area, about the most recent developments there. The SHA informs me that trauma cases in its area are handled by nine acute trusts that have a major A and E department and are classified as receiving hospitals in the event of a major incident. Casualties are triaged and assessed on the scene before being taken to the most appropriate hospital to treat their injuries according to the clinical judgment of paramedics and, if needed, BASICS doctors. They are taken either by ambulance or by air ambulance. If required, BASICS volunteers are activated by the ambulance service for the treatment of casualties on scene, and acute trusts have the ability to activate their own doctors and nurses to form a mobile medical team to assist with the provision of pre-hospital care.

I turn to the hon. Gentleman's point, which has been repeated in the media, about a consultant in A and E who was a volunteer being told that they could not go to the scene of an incident. I do not know whether that example is hypothetical or real, but it has been raised before. The national clinical director for emergency access, Sir George Alberti, of whom many hon. Members may have heard, is looking into whether there may be merit in the Department's appointing a specialist trauma tsar to help to drive the national network. The danger is that if we appoint too many tsars, we will reduce their value.

Sir George was asked about that particular case recently on Radio 4. He said that that would not be acceptable, and that clinical priorities should always come first. He said that if someone was making an allegation based on a real example, they should provide him with details and he would look into it, but he has not heard anything more. If the hon. Gentleman would like to, he can furnish either me or Sir George with such an example. We have made it quite clear, as should hospitals, that if there is a clinical need for somebody to go out to the scene of an accident, that should happen—South Central SHA has told me that. Such a person should not be held back in A and E because they are on duty there or because of the desire to hit a target. I wished to put that on record for the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether I have received a request to meet NCEPOD. I have not received such a request, but I have asked to meet NCEPOD about a different matter that came up in the past two weeks, so I am sure that we shall take the opportunity of discussing this matter. As he has acknowledged, NCEPOD has regular meetings with my officials, and its input has been important in helping us to draw up the proposals that we shall publish shortly when Ara Darzi publishes his full next-stage review.

South Central SHA informs me that it is working with the South Central ambulance service to improve the current arrangements for pre-hospital medical teams, by implementing processes to activate mobile emergency response incident teams. That will improve the performance of the trauma system, based on previous major incidents in its region and nationally. It has made it clear in its next-stage review vision document that it wants to improve care for trauma patients. The document states:

"Emergency and urgent care will be provided through a network of A&E departments" including

"specialist emergency centres for stroke, heart attacks and trauma."

On major trauma specifically, its acute care clinical pathway group report recommends that major trauma networks be established, with dedicated major trauma centres and bypass protocols for ambulance services.

That brings me to the issue of the hon. Gentleman's helipad—well, not his helipad but the one in Southampton. Forgive me, but I am not completely au fait with the likely configuration of any major trauma centre in his region. I suspect that one or two hospitals—or maybe more—are competing for that status. Clearly, his point about access to air ambulances is important, even if it is not necessarily a showstopper. I shall say a little more about air ambulances in a moment.

The hon. Gentleman has said that the chief executive of his local hospital has stated that there is a funding problem. However, I have been informed that Southampton University Hospitals NHS Trust is looking at a £17 million-plus surplus this year. The hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead has questioned the projected costs described by the hon. Member for Winchester, which may be worth consideration. If the hon. Member for Winchester is suggesting that the hospital does not have any money, that is just not the case.

Sandra Gidley: We must be careful in talking about a £17 million surplus, because Southampton hospital is also paying off rather a large loan. One should not be mentioned without the context of the other, and that amount of spare money is not floating around the system in Southampton.

Mr. Bradshaw: All that I wanted to do was put on record the fact that Southampton hospital is not in deficit. In fact, it is looking forward to what sounds to me like a healthy surplus this year, and how it decides to spend its surplus is entirely its decision.

I wish to say a little about the funding of air ambulances. We had a lengthy debate on the matter in this Chamber back in February, I think, and I do not intend to cover the same ground in great detail—hon. Members who were not present may like to study the Hansard of the debate. In the past, we have undertaken independent research on the cost-benefit of giving more state funding to air ambulances. Before 2002, there was no statutory requirement on, or guidance about, state funding for air ambulances, all of which were wholly funded by voluntary contributions. That has changed, and since 2002 we have issued guidance that the medical staff provided on air ambulances should generally be funded from public money, and that they need to work closely with their local ambulance trusts. My latest information is that that happens in almost all parts of the country, if not all.

There is another point that we might want to discuss outside the debate or in correspondence. I notice from the correspondence that I have received, from parliamentary questions tabled by the hon. Members for Winchester and for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) and from an early day motion tabled by the hon. Member for Winchester, that there is some confusion about a difference between London and the rest of the country, and I shall try to get more details about exactly what that difference might be. The hon. Gentleman has suggested that there is statutory funding in London for the air ambulance, in the way that I have just described, but that is so in most other parts of the country as well, thanks to the change in the policy that we introduced in 2002.

In February's debate, I made the point that we constantly review the policy. I mentioned that one of the problems in justifying full public funding for air ambulances is that they do not all have a good record at targeting the right sort of cases. I also said that moving to greater regionalisation of trauma care, with fewer major trauma centres, might tip the balance of cost-benefit in favour of more statutory funding for air ambulances. In that debate, I promised to keep this matter under review. I repeat that undertaking today.

I have forgotten for the moment the other issue that I wanted to mention, so I invite hon. Members to intervene.

Sir George Young: Just to clarify the Government's position, is the Minister saying that it is not acceptable that critical pre-hospital care should be dependent on volunteers?

Mr. Bradshaw: Critical pre-hospital care is not dependent on volunteers, because any ambulance service or acute service will have a range of reactions to a major incident in its area. I have already described the response provided by the ambulance service, which involves having ever-greater skills on board to provide some of the care. Where necessary, teams of doctors will and should be called out to attend an incident to provide such care.

I have also acknowledged that we still have some way to go in providing optimal care, that, generally, the treatment of major trauma has not advanced as quickly as advances in many other forms of care and that we have not performed as well as some other countries. This is partly to do with the different systems in other countries. The hon. Member for Winchester has made comparisons with Germany and the United States, which have different health structures, more specialist centres, different systems and approaches and far higher funding per head of population on health care than in this country.

Mike Penning: The Minister is being generous in giving way. Can I clarify what he said a few moments ago? Should medical staff on an air ambulance be funded by the PCT or the trust under the NHS? Are the pilot and navigator, or whatever, the charity's responsibility, and should the personnel dealing with the medical skills side be funded by the NHS?

Mr. Bradshaw: I cannot remember whether the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead attended the February debate—perhaps one of his colleagues was here. This is not a requirement, and we published guidance on the point in 2002. Our information is that in the majority of cases those medical costs are met from statutory funding, which was previously not the case.

I should like to add one more thing about the role of ambulance trusts and their relationship with BASICS. We looked at that matter in a little bit of detail once we knew that this debate had been scheduled. We understand, having spoken to ambulance trusts, that they have clear systems that allow them and their control staff to call on the expertise of BASICS doctors when an incident demands it. As I have said, I hope that the work that is emerging from all the strategic health authorities in the context of Ara Darzi's visions will help us to improve the way in which we deal with trauma and all the health care pathways that hon. Members care about.

Mr. Oaten: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I hear what he has said on the evidence in respect of how things are working. However, what about this statistic? There were 1,200 requests for individuals to come out, but not all those requests were met. The evidence shows that individuals were not able to go out on 450 occasions last year. Surely, the Minister acknowledges that there is a gap and that something is wrong.

Mr. Bradshaw: I will study those figures, which I have not seen and do not recognise. I have already acknowledged that we can do more to improve the service provided to people who are involved in trauma before they are admitted to hospital. I promise to write to the hon. Gentleman in response to the particular figures that he has mentioned, but I hope that he acknowledges that, given what I have said, the Government are determined to improve the quality of care for severely injured patients.

I welcome the consensus in this debate that the most effective way to provide the service is through good regional planning and by regional managers and hospital managers working closely with expert clinicians and the local population. I look forward to the recommendations from my noble Friend Lord Darzi's review and to their successful delivery across the country.

Lance Corporal Compton (Compensation)

10.56 am

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I welcome you to the Chair, Dr. McCrea. I also welcome the Minister, who is slowly and surely taking his place, and thank him for taking the time to respond to this debate.

I intend to conduct this debate in five sections. First, I shall make some introductory remarks about my interest in the case. Secondly, I shall be clear about what we want to achieve this morning. Thirdly, I will sketch out the background to the issue. Fourthly, I will run through the key points that need addressing. Fifthly, I shall wrap up with some concluding remarks.

I have two interests in this case—a constituency interest and a regimental interest. The constituency interest is that Lance Corporal Compton lives just—but only just—outside my Faversham and Mid-Kent constituency, in Staplehurst. His Member of Parliament, my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) is, incidentally, fully briefed on this case and is fully supportive. Therefore Lance Corporal Compton and I have the county of Kent in common.

The second connection, which is probably more obvious, is regimental, because we both served in the Life Guards. I served in that regiment from 1982 to 1995, and although three of those years were spent at university, I saw active service in Northern Ireland, with the UN in Bosnia and as adjutant of the regiment during the Gulf war. None of that, it is fair to say, bears comparison with the Army of today, particularly given the intensity of the low-level, hand-to-hand fighting seen in Afghanistan. In a week in which the death toll has reached 100, it is hardly surprising that there have been a considerable number of horrific injuries, such as the one that we are debating today.

I should like, in passing, to pay tribute to the Household Cavalry, which has supported Lance Corporal Compton right through his recovery and will, no doubt, continue to support him in the years ahead. I also pay tribute to Alistair Galloway, a young officer who served with the regiment and who, despite leaving the Army, has continued to help and advise Lance Corporal Compton.

What do I hope to achieve with this morning's debate? The answer is simple. For reasons that I will outline, an offer of only 57 per cent. of the maximum compensation payable is inadequate recompense for injuries including third degree burns to 70 per cent. of his body, the loss of his ears and nose and complex injuries to his left arm and right leg that will never fully recover. It is inexcusable—I suspect the Minister agrees with me—that Lance Corporal Compton has received no indication whatsoever of the guaranteed income payment, which is effectively his pension, that he will receive for the rest of his life on leaving the Army.

I absolutely do not want to turn this into a party political issue or open up a wider debate about the operation of the armed forces compensation scheme, although that would be a worthwhile outcome. I simply seek to persuade the Minister that he should look again at this case, personally and as quickly as possible, to right what I believe, as a former soldier and current parliamentarian, is a horrible injustice. If the Minister agrees to re-examine this case personally and as quickly as possible, as far as I am concerned that will be a good outcome from this morning's debate.

What is the background to the case? Lance Corporal Compton was injured in southern Afghanistan on 1 August 2006 while serving with D Squadron of the Household Cavalry Regiment in Helmand province. As the driver of a Spartan armoured reconnaissance vehicle, he suffered third degree burns to 70 per cent. of his body and a gunshot wound to his leg during a Taliban ambush on the vehicle. He was the only survivor of the incident, which resulted in the deaths of three of his colleagues from an improvised explosive device, or IED—I suspect, Dr. McCrea, that you will be familiar with such devices from your own constituency—and a direct rocket-propelled grenade attack. He fell from the vehicle while he was on fire and removed his burning body armour and helmet while coming under fire from the Taliban. He then crawled more than 80 m into cover, where he sustained a gunshot wound to his leg. It is a remarkable story. Lance Corporal Compton was rescued by other colleagues and evacuated to Camp Bastion, where he fell into a coma that lasted for three months, during which time he was revived after "dying" on three occasions. He was then flown to the specialist burns unit at Broomfield hospital in Chelmsford, Essex.

As a result of the attack, Lance Corporal Compton has lost both of his ears and his nose, which have been rebuilt. He has undergone multiple operations to repair his face and body, and he is still having rehabilitation treatment at the defence services medical rehabilitation centre at Headley Court in Surrey. That has enabled him to walk again and to regain the use of his arms and legs, but he will require further surgery and care in the future. It is an extraordinary tale that has clearly resulted in horrific and lifelong injuries.

The case presents two key issues. First and most importantly, the lump sum award made to Lance Corporal Compton under the armed forces compensation scheme does not reflect the severity of the 10 injuries that he sustained or account for the continued requirement for medical care that he will have for the rest of his life, his loss of future earnings—he can never be promoted again within the Army—and the momentous impact that his injuries will necessarily have on his quality of life. In my view, he fully deserves the maximum award, which is capped at £285,000.

Secondly, Lance Corporal Compton has still not received an indication of the guaranteed income payment to be paid annually for the rest of his life, which he is likely to receive on medical discharge from the armed forces—I referred to that point earlier. For fairly obvious reasons, it would be of immense benefit to him to calculate his income for the rest of this life, so that he can plan appropriately for the future.

Those are the two key issues, but the case raises a number of other matters, and I would be interested to hear the Minister's comments on them. First, the Veterans Agency appears to have paid out the lowest amount available for each of the specific injuries sustained by Lance Corporal Compton. For example, burns to the face and neck are compensated as a tariff level 7 injury at £34,500. However, if Lance Corporal Compton were compensated for the loss of his nose and ears—he has clearly lost them—a considerably higher tariff, which runs up to £86,250, would be used. If the Veterans Agency is going to pick and choose between very different tariffs, surely—particularly in cases such as this—it should choose the higher tariff.

Secondly, the revised award to Lance Corporal Compton does not appear to take account of all his various injuries. As a result, injuries to his arms are included in the award, but there is no compensation for the smoke inhalation injuries that he suffered. If the compensation were calculated for all the different injuries that he received—a lawyer has actually done that calculation—Lance Corporal Compton would have come out above the maximum compensation figure.

Thirdly and far more generally, the armed forces compensation scheme is, as the Minister knows, currently undergoing a review. How long will that review take, and will Lance Corporal Compton's compensation be reconsidered as a result? If the scheme is upgraded, I hope that Lance Corporal Compton will be in a position to benefit. Finally, there is the question whether the capped level of £285,000 is appropriate in cases such as this where the injuries are so horrific.

In conclusion, in Lance Corporal Compton we have a wholly extraordinary young man who saw three of his comrades killed and who then crawled 80 yd under fire while still alight. As a result, he sustained horrific injuries, including third degree burns to 70 per cent. of his body, the loss of his ears and nose, and the loss of full use of his arms and legs.

In fairness to the Minister and the Ministry of Defence, I accept that it is difficult to reconcile injuries on that horrific scale with a standard formula. However, there is a clear case for the Minister personally to call for this file and to reconsider the case as quickly as possible, with a view to awarding Lance Corporal Compton maximum compensation. I also hope that the Minister will undertake not only to carry out an independent review of the case but to arrange for Lance Corporal Compton to receive an indication of his likely pension—the guaranteed income payment—as a matter of urgency.

In a week in which the death toll in Afghanistan has reached 100, it is appropriate this morning to pay tribute to all those who have lost their lives or been injured on operations. It is vital that all our servicemen deployed on active service know that they will be properly, and I hope generously, looked after if they suffer injury, particularly injury of this severity. As I am sure the Minister will agree, they deserve no less.

11.6 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Derek Twigg): I congratulate the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) on securing this debate on this very important subject. He rightly raises a number of issues relating to this case that I hope to address today. First, however, I want to express my deep sympathy to the family, comrades and friends of the three soldiers—Privates Nathan Cuthbertson, Daniel Gamble and Charles Murray—who were killed in Afghanistan at the weekend. Of course, my thoughts are also with the loved ones of the other members of the armed forces who have lost their lives, both in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The amount of compensation awarded to sailors, soldiers and airmen who are injured in the service of this country, and to the families of those who sadly have lost their lives, is a very important issue that matters greatly to individual service personnel and their families.

I know that, as the hon. Gentleman said, he served in the same regiment as Lance Corporal Martyn Compton and I congratulate him on his distinguished service. I am sure that he will join me and the whole House in recognising and paying tribute to the courage, professionalism and commitment shown by Lance Corporal Compton and all members of the armed forces, and by the families who support them. Of course, I congratulate the Household Cavalry on the support that it has shown for its injured service personnel, particularly Lance Corporal Compton.

I want to say at the outset that the Government are fully committed to meeting our duty of care to serving personnel, veterans and their families. As has been recognised by many organisations, including the Royal British Legion, we are making improvements, including to service pay, accommodation, health and welfare provisions, force protection and personal equipment. Of course, however, we recognise that there is still scope for further improvements. That is why we are working on a cross-Government Command Paper on personnel, which will examine a range of issues to see what we are doing well, what we could improve on and what it is possible to achieve.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of the review of the armed forces compensation scheme, which I announced recently and for which we had asked. I cannot give him a date at this stage as to when we can say something further, but the fact that we are reviewing the scheme is important in itself.

I of course want to join the hon. Gentleman—I am sure that all hon. Members do—in wishing Lance Corporal Compton the speediest possible recovery from his condition and the injuries that he has received. I met him last week to discuss both his experiences of welfare support and the compensation issues. I regularly meet injured personnel; I make a point of meeting them at Selly Oak hospital, Headley Court or elsewhere.

A number of questions have been raised today about the particulars of Lance Corporal Compton's case. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that, while I am happy to discuss such issues with Lance Corporal Compton directly, it is only appropriate that I confine my remarks this morning to the support, compensation and welfare available to the armed forces in general, rather than discussing the particulars of one case, as important as that case is.

There are a couple of issues that I will respond to. Lance Corporal Compton raised the issue of the notification of the guaranteed income payment with me last week, and I assured him that we will get him an assessment of what that payment will be, based of course on his current salary, because the amount will depend on what his final salary is. We will carry out that assessment and such assessments will be made for other injured service personnel in the future, too.

The hon. Gentleman asked a specific question about medical care and compensation. While Corporal Compton is in the care of the armed forces, that would be provided either directly through the armed forces or through the hospital that we use in his case. Thereafter, responsibility will fall to the national health service, which will be responsible for ensuring that the highest possible standard of medical care is provided. We have been working closely with the Department of Health on these issues over recent months, and, as part of announcements that I made several months ago, a case officer will now be allocated by the Service Personnel and Veterans Agency to work with and help the most seriously injured personnel, certainly in the first two years and thereafter if necessary, if they are discharged. As I said, that is a new initiative.

[Derek Twigg]

The armed forces compensation scheme came into effect in April 2005. For the first time, it provides for a lump sum payment to be made to serving members of the armed forces who are injured due to service. I stress that this is the first time that compensation is being paid in-service to injured service personnel. That is an important step forward and an improvement made by this Government.

The lump sum award compensates for pain and suffering and is made under a tariff-based system that is informed by existing established models such as the Judicial Studies Board guidelines for the assessment of general damages in personal injury cases, and the criminal injuries compensation scheme. We review the tariff levels periodically, and, as I announced to the House in April, such a review is under way.

The most seriously injured are also awarded a guaranteed income payment, which we have just discussed. I stress that it is a tax-free, index-linked payment made every month from discharge for the rest of the individual's life; it does not stop at retirement. That important point often gets overlooked—deliberately so by sections of the press. The guaranteed income payment is part of the whole compensation package.

When we constructed the scheme, we listened to the advice of ex-service organisations to give lifetime financial security, rather than adding to the lump sum in the initial award, as is done in some civil cases. Again, that is an important point. We could have made it all part of a lump sum, but we did not. We thought that income for life was an important aspect of the compensation.

I believe that the guaranteed income payment provides better support for our servicemen and women, but, regrettably, it means that the true value of an armed forces compensation scheme award is not always readily understood. I stress again that the guaranteed income payment is part of the whole package. Between the lump sum and the guaranteed income payment, individuals can receive hundreds of thousands of pounds over a lifetime, and, unlike other compensation schemes such as the criminal injuries compensation scheme, the armed forces compensation scheme has no monetary cap.

To give an example—I stress that this is an example, but one that is worth tabling—a 25-year-old soldier earning £22,000 a year who is very seriously injured may receive up to the £285,000 maximum lump sum. He will continue to be paid while in service, including during rehabilitation, which may last for several years. On discharge, he will receive a guaranteed income payment of around £19,000 per year, which will be tax-free and index-linked. That is an example, but it shows the sort of payments that can be made. By the time the individual reaches the age of 45, he will have received £380,000 by way of a guaranteed income payment. By the time of his 65th birthday, he will have received some £760,000 plus the lump sum. I stress that the guaranteed income payment figures are baseline amounts and are, in fact, uplifted year on year to take account of inflation.

As the armed forces compensation scheme is relatively new, we keep it under review in the light of experience. For example, in common with other injury schemes, the armed forces compensation scheme contains a multiple injury discounting rule to prevent those with a large number of relatively minor injuries from receiving more than someone with fewer, more serious injuries.

Hugh Robertson: That is the nub of the problem, is it not? I entirely accept the logic of the situation, but there is a reverse effect, whereby if the injuries are as severe as they are in this case, the tick-box method on the form may not be capable of reflecting the absolute severity of the injuries suffered by this young man.

Derek Twigg: That is the nub of the whole debate, which goes slightly wider than that, but I accept the hon. Gentleman's point and it is an important one to make. At the end of the day, what payment is enough for our injured service personnel? Many people have different views on that—I will probably return to that a little later—but I stress that the point about what would be enough is important. We have to base the scheme on past practice and on other schemes to come to a conclusion about the sort of scheme that we should offer. As I said, we based this scheme on the Judicial Studies Board and on precedents that have been set. No scheme is perfect, but the key issue is whether those with the most serious multiple injuries get the best award. I accept that the point is important, but it is not straightforward.

At the end of last year, we recognised that the scheme was not fully meeting its policy intent of focusing resources on those who were most seriously injured. We therefore changed the rules relating to those who suffered multiple injuries from a single incident, better to reflect the serious and complex nature of some of the injuries that servicemen and women were receiving on operations. That was widely welcomed as a step forward. It is important to stress that the armed forces compensation scheme addresses pain and suffering, as well as the loss of earning capacity.

Individuals leaving the services also have access to all the state benefits that cover the other elements of civil compensation awards such as the NHS, which I have mentioned, for ongoing treatment, the disabled facilities grant for home adaptation, and the disabled living allowance for care. For instance, I know that the homes of some service personnel who are still in service were adapted to take account of disability.

It is worth reminding ourselves that any member of the armed forces injured due to service has access to these awards on a no-fault basis—this is a key point—without there being a need for negligence on the MOD'S part or for a time-consuming and costly legal process.

As I said, there are a variety of opinions about what the right compensation should be for those injured while in service. No amount of money can adequately compensate for some of the more serious injuries received by our armed forces personnel, but the armed forces compensation scheme does deliver no-fault compensation for those who are injured and for the families of those who are killed as a result of their service in the armed forces.

Of course, welfare for injured service personnel is much broader than the compensation. This is an important point: medical care is often caught up in the wider welfare provision for injured service personnel. I want to make a few important points about medical care, which starts with the care that they receive in theatre and, for the more seriously injured, continues with the clinical care that they receive once they are returned to the UK for specialist treatment.

Since 2001, the Royal Centre for Defence Medicine, which I visit regularly, based at the University Hospital Birmingham Foundation Trust, has been the main receiving unit for military casualties evacuated from an operational theatre. The clear view of all the injured service personnel and families whom I spoke to during my last visit was that they were being really well looked after. There were no complaints about the care that they were receiving.

In the Birmingham area, military patients can benefit from the concentration of five specialist hospitals, including Selly Oak hospital, to receive an excellent level of clinical care. Indeed, I and many others believe that Selly Oak is at the leading edge in the medical care of the most common types of injuries that our casualties sustain. If there is a need for urgent specialist treatment that cannot be immediately provided in the Birmingham area, we ensure that the patient is admitted promptly to a unit elsewhere in the UK that specialises in the particular injury, such as the burns unit at Broomfield hospital.

The Defence Committee recently described the treatment available to troops injured on operations as "second to none" overall—an assessment that I share, having visited our patients and staff in field hospitals in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as in NHS hospitals in the UK. All veterans now receive priority care on the NHS after discharge for conditions caused by their service. The NHS recently reinforced that message.

If military patients require further rehabilitation following initial hospital treatment, they may be referred to the Defence Medical Rehabilitation Centre at Headley Court in Surrey, which is widely recognised as delivering first-class specialist rehabilitation of complex cases. The Government recognise that continuing investment is needed to ensure that Headley Court retains its reputation as a centre of excellence, and have recently announced that they will invest an additional £24 million in the Headley Court site over the next four years to maintain and enhance its capabilities. The new investment, together with current funding for new facilities, means that Headley Court will see an investment over those four years totalling some £24 million, in addition to substantial funding that the charity Help for Heroes intends to provide for the new rehabilitation complex. We also adapt service accommodation, where appropriate, for injured personnel who are able and willing to continue their service career. That is another important point. Many injured service personnel remain in service.

Injured personnel also receive welfare support during their treatment and convalescence. Visiting officers, available on 24-hour call-out duty, maintain regular contact with injured service personnel. The Birmingham welfare office supports the hospitals in that area, there are regular welfare surgeries at Headley Court and the veterans welfare service contacts seriously injured personnel before their medical discharge. In combination, those services provide support to injured personnel and their families throughout treatment. We have also increased community psychiatric and nursing support.

No amount of money can adequately compensate for some of the serious injuries received by our armed forces personnel, but the Ministry of Defence can and does ensure that those injured in service are provided with exemplary health care.

Hugh Robertson: I thank the Minister for his remarks about the armed forces compensation scheme and his commitment to ensuring that Lance Corporal Compton gets a proper indication of his guaranteed income payment. Will he also look again at the file? I accept that no figure could possibly compensate that young man for his injuries, but for better or worse, there is a figure of £285,000. I, as his representative this morning, would like to ensure that he receives the maximum sum possible for his injuries under the scheme. Will the Minister undertake to look again at the file to see whether that is possible?

Derek Twigg: The straightforward answer is yes. I said to Lance-Corporal Compton last week when we discussed the nature of the injuries and how they were compensated that I would look at it, and I will.

As I was saying, the Ministry of Defence can and does ensure that those injured in service are provided with exemplary health care, a compensation award to reflect the pain and suffering that they have experienced, welfare support and, in the cases of the more seriously injured, a tax-free income stream for life to reflect the loss of potential earnings and pension. I reiterate, because the press often deliberately overlook it, that we provide a guaranteed income payment that can amount to hundreds of thousands of pounds during a lifetime.

I believe that we are supporting our armed forces personnel and their families to a much greater degree than ever before. We can always look to see what can be improved, and we continually review what we do for our armed forces personnel and veterans and their families. That is why we are reviewing the compensation scheme. I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a time scale or tell him what the conclusion might be; I can only say that the fact that we are reviewing it indicates that we are not sitting back. We always listen to the contributions and representations made to us. We will make an announcement at the appropriate time.

11.22 am

Sitting suspended.

Minimum Wage

2.30 pm

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to have the opportunity to introduce a debate on enforcing the minimum wage. I am raising the issue in the House this afternoon because of a recent case from my constituency, which in turn highlighted a number of wider problems with the national minimum wage and its enforcement.

The national minimum wage is one of the big success stories of this Government. By one estimate, its introduction has brought at least 1.3 million people extra income and it has been particularly beneficial for women, who make up 70 per cent. of the beneficiaries. Part-time workers have also benefited—about two thirds of the jobs affected have been part time. Despite the hysteria in some quarters when it was introduced—I am referring to the official Opposition—the national minimum wage has not cost jobs; in fact, the evidence is that it has created jobs.

It is a success story, but to reap the full benefits the national minimum wage must be enforced. Minimum wage enforcement teams throughout the UK have had a degree of success. According to figures given in various sources, in the past year the teams identified more than £3 million in underpaid salaries throughout the UK, and they have helped to return more than £27 million to about 80,000 underpaid workers since 1999. To give an example, recently, as a result of only one call to the helpline, 180 employees of a company in the London area shared a total payout—they were owed the money, of course—of more than £100,000.

Many cases, however, slip through the net, which is what I want to concentrate on today, and in particular on one case from my constituency. About two years ago, a woman, a foreign national, who worked in a restaurant, came to my surgery with her partner. I will not give her name for reasons that will become obvious when I recount her story. She was on low pay and discovered that she was being paid less than the national minimum wage. She found out about the wage and how to assert her rights. She complained to her boss, but made no progress on receiving her rightful minimum wage. After a while, her boss sacked her because of her requests.

My constituent complained to the national minimum wage helpline. She was here legally and had a work permit, but its terms required her to find a new employer within four weeks if it was not to become invalid. However, her boss let it be known to others in that sector of the restaurant trade that she was a trouble-maker because she complained that she did not get the minimum wage, so she had difficulty finding a new employer. Thanks to the intervention of the Department responsible for such things at the time—it was either the Home Office or the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—she was given an extension on the period in which to find a new employer to three months, and was able to get a new job and stay in the UK.

My constituent worked with the national minimum wage enforcement unit to try to get the money that she was due from her previous employer, and they worked out that she was due more than £6,000 in back pay because of the low wage that she had received. I intervened to try to sort out the difficulty caused by her work permit, and was in contact with her up to the stage at which she was trying to get the £6,000 she was owed. I thought that the case had been solved, that there had been a satisfactory result, and that the woman had got her due rights.

However, a few weeks ago, my constituent came to my surgery with the same problem, because the story did not end as happily as I thought it would. I was told that the enforcement unit, because of a heavy work load, had not been able to bring the case to a conclusion in almost two years. During that time, my constituent's family had been threatened with violence, presumably to persuade her to withdraw her claim here in the UK, and the employer resisted making payments. Eventually, at the request of the enforcement unit, which wanted to bring the case to a conclusion, my constituent agreed to settle for a lesser sum than she thought was due. She agreed to receive £4,000 and, as I understand it, an order to that effect was made by an employment tribunal, after which her employer, which was a limited company, went into liquidation without paying her a penny. She is pursuing the matter as best she can, but the outcome was that when she tried to enforce her rights, she found that the enforcement unit was unable to act as quickly as she felt it ought to. As a result, she has not received a penny for the wages that she was due some two years ago.

I emphasise that my constituent does not complain about the individual officers in the unit; she feels that they worked very hard to help her with her case. She was told, however, that the officers' work load was such that they were not able to put the time that they would wish into individual cases.

That case led me to make inquiries about the enforcement of the national minimum wage, and it now seems to me that there are a number of ways in which to make enforcement more effective. According to the Government's estimates, almost 300,000 UK workers are being paid less than the minimum wage. I shall not go into all the case studies that I have seen because of the time, but organisations such as Citizens Advice suggest that it is a big problem in many areas of the UK. Indeed, since the national minimum wage was introduced, there have been only three successful criminal prosecutions for offences involving disregard of national minimum wage regulations by employers. Many more cases resulted in payments of back pay, but criminal prosecutions have been rare.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): We had a similar debate on poverty a week or two ago. Does my hon. Friend recall the last pre-Budget statement by the Prime Minister when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer? He announced that the Government were increasing the resources to tackle non-compliance by 50 per cent.—£3 million or more. Does my hon. Friend know how that money was used? There appears to have been a steady growth in the number of cases of failure to pay the national minimum wage, not only by direct employers but by outsourcing at arm's length through agencies. The latter arrangement is difficult to tackle.

Mark Lazarowicz: My hon. Friend raises a good point and the Minister will doubtless answer his question. Certainly, more resources have been put into enforcement of the national minimum wage—I was coming to this point—some of which have gone into hiring an extra 20 enforcement officers, which is welcome. Various tougher penalties are being imposed upon employers who break the law, which I also welcome, but more needs to be done on grass-roots enforcement to get the full benefits to those who deserve the Government's support to get the wages that they are due.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing an excellent debate this afternoon. Given the context of his constituent's case, have any criminal charges been brought in Scotland, where there is a separate jurisdiction for criminal law? Does he believe that the staff in the minimum wage enforcement unit are familiar with the practices under Scots law and is there sufficient co-ordination between them and the Justice Department in Edinburgh?

Mark Lazarowicz: I hazard a guess that my hon. Friend thinks that the answer is no. Nevertheless, she raises an important point. The unit has to take account of the situation in different parts of the United Kingdom, particularly where a Department in another Government has some responsibilities in this area and where there is a separate legal system. My hon. Friend makes a good point to which I hope the Minister will respond today, or at a later stage. I do not know of any prosecutions in Scotland. That is important, because as well as enforcing legislation, prosecutions of this nature are an effective means of giving an exemplary reminder to employers who do not meet their duties of what can happen if they do not fulfil the requirements of the minimum wage.

I recognise that the Government have put in extra staff and resources, which is good news, and hopefully that will lead to results. We must look seriously at providing more staff and resources to enforce the minimum wage on the ground. From what my constituent was told by the officers concerned, her experience was that they felt unable to keep up with all the complaints made to them as quickly as they would like to. More staff resources should bring results in terms of real cash going to people who are not getting the money to which they are entitled. There needs to be an investigation, at least, into providing more staff.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): From the story that my hon. Friend related earlier, it appears that a lot of low-paid workers are too intimidated to apply for an inspection to allow them to be paid the minimum wage. Would it not be better to have a much more rigorous, proactive inspection regime in which employers are checked regularly by inspectors to ensure that they are paying the minimum wage, rather than leaving the onus on employees to make a complaint in the first place, because they might be intimidated into not doing so?

Mark Lazarowicz: My hon. Friend makes a good point, particularly given that in certain sectors, about which all hon. Members know, there is more likelihood of exploitation of the type he mentions and it is more likely that people will be paid below the minimum wage. One statistic suggests that, on average, a business could be expected to be visited once every 330 years by wage inspectors. In some ways that is a meaningless statistic, but it makes the point that there is in respect of certain sectors a strong case for much more proactive enforcement of the minimum wage regulations.

The role of the employee or other members of the public in reporting non-payment of a minimum wage is crucial. We need to consider making changes to the publicity of the national minimum wage, so that people can understand what it is, what they are entitled to and how to complain about non-enforcement. There are advertising campaigns, which I welcome, including a recent national and regional online advertising campaign, which may still be ongoing. A bus campaign has visited many parts of the UK; however, I understand that there is just one bus, not a fleet of buses. One bus will take quite a while to reach most parts of the UK, even allowing for fast progress between different locations. That suggests that we should pay more attention to publicity.

We need to do more to target ethnic minority workers, who are often underpaid and are often, for all sorts of reasons that hon. Members can appreciate, the most vulnerable in respect of irresponsible and criminal employers. There is material in ethnic minority languages, and other work of that nature is being done. However, from my knowledge of my constituency—I am sure that this is replicated elsewhere—a lot more could be done to make a particular effort to target ethnic minority workers in their workplaces and where they gather, and through their media outlets and in other ways.

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): May I apologise for arriving late, Dr. McCrea?

Would it be appropriate to ask local authorities, which are major employers, to make sure that the minimum wage is part of the subcontract detail when they subcontract? They should be ensuring that the minimum wage is paid.

Mark Lazarowicz: Indeed; that is another important method that could be used.

I mentioned targeting publicity on the enforcement of the minimum wage at ethnic minority workers. This is a delicate area at the moment in some political debates, as colleagues will recognise. However, there is an issue—there is no point in hiding it—in many parts of the country where there is a feeling that ethnic minority workers can undercut UK workers. That is actually happening in some cases—there is no point in denying that—and it leads to all sorts of tensions and resentments between ethnic minority workers and the UK citizen work force. Of course, ethnic minority workers are not necessarily UK citizens.

One of the best ways of reducing the possible tensions is to remove as far as possible the opportunity for people to feel threatened by being undercut for their work, and to prevent their being paid less than the national minimum wage. The more that we can do to ensure that ethnic minority workers get at least the national minimum wage and are not exploited, the more we benefit the resident UK work force, be it ethnic minority or not. We can do a lot to benefit ethnic minority workers and the wider work force, and to benefit or improve inter-community relations in a way that leads to a win-win situation.

David Taylor: Having spent time in Crewe toward the end of the recent by-election campaign, I heard a lot of anecdotal evidence on the doorstep—no doubt this is so in lots of other towns throughout the country—that eastern European workers were undercutting in ways that breached the national minimum wage legislation. Is it not possible for the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs or Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs to establish a roadshow, for example, to promote the minimum wage and act as a point of reference in towns from which complaints are received, in order to put the case in the public spotlight?

[David Taylor]

Mark Lazarowicz: That is a good point. My hon. Friend mentions anecdotal evidence. It may be anecdotal but it is also true: such anecdotes are soundly based. There are instances of migrant workers, rather than ethnic minority workers, being exploited in this way. The more we direct efforts to ensure that they are not exploited, the more everyone benefits, including both the migrant and the domestic work force.

I have been involved in campaigns in my constituency with trade unions and representative organisations from migrant worker groups. Although some material on these issues in various languages is available from Departments and from the Trades Union Congress and other organisations, not a lot of material is available and there is not a lot of easily accessible information that could allow maximum take-up of these rights by both UK and migrant workers, who might be from ethnic minorities.

Ann McKechin: Is my hon. Friend concerned, as I was, about a recent report in The Guardian, which said that, until there is an increase in expenditure on advertising the minimum wage hotline, the amount spent by the Government is a sixth of that spent on a recent Government campaign urging people to use tissues when they sneeze? Does he not agree that now is the time for us to give this issue much greater priority throughout the UK, particularly, as he has mentioned, for ethnic workers and low-paid women?

Mark Lazarowicz: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point that, unfortunately, has taken away the last, ringing point that I was going to make. That again highlights the fact that, despite the number of workers who are entitled to and receive the national minimum wage, there are still too many who are not getting that to which they are entitled.

I return to where I started. Introducing the national minimum wage is one of the biggest success stories of this Labour Government, and we should do everything that we can to ensure that all those who are entitled to it receive it. That requires spending money to bring about reinforcement. Spending money in that way will benefit not just the workers concerned but the wider community. In some cases, it may also benefit the Exchequer. As people receive more income, they will enter the wage system in a way that they previously did not. For all those reasons, I urge the Minister to consider ways in which her Department, working with other Departments, can increase the uptake of the national minimum wage. I look forward to other hon. Members' contributions to this debate.

2.51 pm

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing this very important debate. Many constituencies face issues that reflect his concerns about non-enforcement.

I do not want to give three cheers for the minimum wage, because it deserves only one cheer—possibly two, at a stretch. We know the stories: £1.50 an hour in the security industry and £1.50 an hour in the forestry industry before the minimum wage. I remember my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown) telling us about the wage rates in his local industry. The reality is that the wage rate has become a poverty trap for many workers. People are being paid less than they would if we had proper trade union legislation and if we returned to the system of industry wage councils, which worked well before they were collapsed by the Conservative Government to allow massive exploitation and the driving down of wages to the point at which people were getting £1.50 an hour.

When we introduced the wage in 1999, it was £3.60, which was far too low. We were afraid of the propaganda that was put out by the Conservatives and by many people in British industry who did not want to see any security for workers. They were quite happy to use the exploitative environment in which the Conservatives had left the working people of this country after 18 years of misrule. The rate was too low, and it has not risen quickly enough. The adult rate of £3.60 has risen to £5.52. It will go up again in October. That is a 53 per cent. increase. It has only gone up by half from a very low base since 1999. That is an average of 6 per cent. a year.

People may say that that is great and that 6 per cent. is a lot more than people are receiving on average. However, it is certainly not comparable with the massive rip-off wages of the people who work in the City or the people who have exploited the oil resources of this country. The finance markets and the domestic markets for fuel are in an unacceptable state, yet the wages returned to those people have gone up by hundreds of per cent., rather than by 6 per cent. per annum.

I want to speak about the development rate. What is a development rate? Where did that phrase come from and what does it mean? The former Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), is here and he put it through, but it is a mystery to me what development is supposed to go on between the ages of 18 and 21 that justified us giving people only £3 an hour instead of £3.60, and at this moment only £4.60.

We made one major improvement in 2004; we recognised that those aged below 18 were being ripped off lock, stock and barrel, because they were not covered by the minimum wage until 2004. Therefore, industries such as burger bars and shops would employ young people aged between 16 to 18, because they were not covered by the minimum wage. At least, we have corrected that. Although we have not given them a great deal, we have at least brought them into the structure.

There is an argument that, at 16 and 17, people should be encouraged to stay in school and not go into employment. Sadly, in my constituency, there are still many people who leave school and end up not in employment, education or training. Eventually, they end up in some low-paid, temporary and pointless job, which pays them a small wage.

What is a development wage? At the age of 18, a young person can fight and die for their country. They can go out on the front line of a battle and die. They can legally drink in a public house and legally purchase alcohol, and by the age of 21, they can do anything that any citizen would wish to do. They can vote at 18, but they cannot get a man's wage. I married when I was 21 and my wife was 19. If we had been that age now, we would be getting paid a development rate if we did not have some other way of finding employment. I used to go out and work on a building site. I did that before I was married; during the holidays I married, and I went back on to that building site. I was paid a man's rate, because I did a man's job.

Today, when a youngster goes on to a building site, someone does not say, "You're getting less of a job and you'll get development." No, they are given a pick and shovel, or some other implement, and told to get in there and work with the rest of the squad. So what is the development rate about? It is a sop to the rip-off merchants who run many of our industries today.

In the retail industry, which is prevalent in West Lothian, everyone who works in a shop is paid the minimum wage or below—they are paid the minimum wage, but they are below the age of 21, so they get £4.60. The top rate of pay for the supervisor who runs the shop is £6.40 an hour. That is the environment to which people have been driven, partly because the minimum wage is so low. It is reprehensible, and we should have done what the trade unions suggested at the time and set the wage at half the median income for the country. Until we start thinking about that and about giving every 18 year old and above the same rate of pay as everyone else on the adult minimum wage, we are offending greatly against the principles that I certainly came into the Labour party to pursue.

I now want to turn to my pet subject—the Minister probably anticipates this—of the minimum wage and the treatment of tips. The famous regulation to which I refer is not in the National Minimum Wage Act 1998. It is so well hidden in the National Minimum Wage Regulations 1999 that when I talked to Professor George Bain, who chaired the Low Pay Commission for four years, he said that he did not know that it existed. He did not know that such things went on. Regulation 31(1)(e) says that, if tips are paid through the payroll, it counts towards the minimum wage. For 2 million people working in the hospitality industry, a large number get their wages from their tips. The minimum wage is not a wage with an addition for the tips that we give them; it is made up of those tips.

What is a tip? As defined by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, everything that is a gratuity, tip, service charge or cover charge is a tip. It has defined that quite clearly for the purposes of tax and national insurance. When we enter a restaurant and it says at the bottom of the bill, "A 12.5 per cent. service charge has been added to this bill"—sometimes it says that that is voluntary and sometimes it does not—we are paying a tip. If we pay that on our credit card—this matter has been judged all the way up to the European Court of Justice—we are paying it to the owner of the restaurant or the hotel premises that we are in. However, if we pay cash and it is paid through a kitty or tronc, which it mainly is, and it goes through the payroll, it still counts towards the minimum wage. So if we give cash, we might not be giving it to the proprietor, but we are still paying the minimum wage with it.

After I introduced a ten-minute Bill in the House, I discussed the matter with the Minister and officials from the Low Pay Commission. I say pejoratively that I found them to be useless. They said, "If we take that away, and tips are in addition to the minimum wage, we will have to find out how much tips people are getting and enforce the tips." However, that is not correct. All they have to do is ensure that people get the minimum wage. The law should say that everything that is paid as a tip or gratuity will have to count on top of the minimum wage. That would redress the balance between the customer and the person who is serving them.

The French word for a tip is a "pourboire", which means "for to drink". That is what a tip is: an additional sum of money on top of someone's wages that they can have some leisure or pleasure with, but that is not so in this country. In this country, because of the regulation I have referred to, tips are paying the wages—a minimum wage—of many people in the hospitality industry. It is time we stopped that. It is also time that we paid a decent minimum wage and the same rate to all adults. People who are above the age of 18 are adults—they have adult responsibilities, and they usually work an adult shift.

If we get rid of the tips anomaly, people who work in the hospitality industry, particularly in this city, would find that they are due what they are given by their customers. If people want proprietors to get more money, put up the cost of the facility or the food. Anything on top of that is what the customer chooses to give as an extra to the staff for the quality of service. That would redress some of the imbalance that occurs at the moment. The issue was recently illustrated by the Daily Mirror and Unite launching the fair tips campaign, which called for a fair tips charter to be displayed by good premises that pay the minimum wage, on top of which tips are paid. I hope that the Government will shortly do something to correct the tips anomaly.

3.1 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): Although it was a huge step forward when Labour brought in the minimum wage, which benefited millions of the lowest paid workers, it is appalling that estimates from the Office for National Statistics show that around 300,000 workers are still in jobs that pay below the minimum wage. As we all know, that is only the tip of the iceberg.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing this timely debate, and I very much agree with the points that he made about strengthening staffing resources and publicising enforcement. I also agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty) about 18 being recognised as the age at which the adult entitlement for the minimum rate should apply, and I think that we all found his arguments persuasive in relation to his convincing obsession with tips.

[Mr. Andrew Smith]

Although progress has been made on the minimum wage, part-time workers, maternity and paternity rights, holiday entitlement, the rights of union representation and the recent agreement on temporary and agency workers, a great deal remains to be done. That was graphically illustrated in the excellent and chilling report, "Hard Work, Hidden Lives", by the Trades Union Congress commission on vulnerable employment. The report sets a compelling agenda on which the Government must act further to improve workers' rights and to ensure that they can access the rights that they are already supposed to have. We must have more debates and campaigns on the wider issues to keep these vital matters at the forefront of people's minds and to secure further progress.

I shall focus on two particular points about minimum wage enforcement that have been brought to my attention by my trade union—the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk referred to the important role of trade unions in these matters. We all have a responsibility to act to counter such abuses, but we must respect and recognise the role that trade unions can play.

I want to make the case that third parties should be able to take representative or group cases to employment tribunals to enforce the minimum wage. At the moment, underpaid workers request that they get their due by contacting the minimum wage helpline and taking a case against the employer to an employment tribunal. Every worker who believes they have been underpaid needs to be named on the application, otherwise they will not be affected by the case, even if they are underpaid.

As we know, if an employer is underpaying one member of staff, in most cases, others are also being underpaid. Workers who are being paid less than the minimum wage are some of the most vulnerable people, as we have heard. Most fear losing their jobs if they take action against their employers to demand the higher pay to which they are entitled. The system identifies every such worker and leaves them vulnerable to reprisals from the employer, as we heard in the awful case raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith.

There are obvious difficulties related to those circumstances and to persuading workers to put their name on an employment tribunal application—let alone being the first on the list. Although workers are protected from day one against unfair dismissal for enforcing the minimum wage, as we know, there are all sorts of ways that an employer can make it impossible for a vulnerable worker to continue their job—for example, unreasonable shifts, denying holiday requests, changing job content, and so on. Many cases of minimum wage underpayment are therefore never brought and that allows unscrupulous employers to think they can get away with it.

To move forward to a solution, we need to revisit the present restrictions whereby trade unions and other third parties are prevented from any involvement in cases of minimum wage enforcement. If a third party makes a complaint to Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, they are not even allowed feedback on the outcome of the case. I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend the Minister addressed that in her reply. As we know, representative actions and group litigation orders are allowed in the courts in certain circumstances. Therefore, it seems anomalous that employment tribunals cannot hear representative action and that their powers to manage group litigation in a way that would help to defend low-paid workers from exploitation are less extensive than those of the courts.

I shall try to hurry through my comments, because other hon. Members want to contribute. A further point relates to the wider remuneration package and employment issues. I want to put the case for HMRC minimum wage enforcement officers to be given the powers and training to enforce wage-related employment rights, including rights to paid holidays, statutory sick pay, maternity and paternity pay. Presently, if an employer fails to pay the minimum wage, they often also deny their staff other rights, including holiday leave, sick pay and maternity and paternity pay.

Even if minimum wage enforcement officers find evidence for such underpayments, they do not have enforcement powers. The only option for a worker to enforce their entitlement to those rights is to take an individual case to the employment tribunal. However, there is no protection against unfair dismissal for a worker who has been in employment for less than one year and who is seeking to enforce their legal rights to such payments. As I said, even if an employee has been in the same job for more than 12 months, an employer can find numerous ways to make it difficult for them to stay in their job and complain about their rights. There is little recourse for vulnerable employees who have been denied those payments. That makes the employment rights that we are proud to have carried forward under this Government of limited practical use to the most vulnerable employees, about whom we should be most concerned.

Given that HMRC inspectors have considerable expertise in dealing with wage issues and unscrupulous employers, there is surely a case for extending their role. With additional training, they could seek out and enforce compliance with the other wage-related employment rights issues. They could also ensure that vulnerable workers are protected and that employers have more to lose than they presently do from evading the law.

The introduction of the minimum wage and other employment rights has been a huge step forward. However, if all workers—particularly the most vulnerable—are to enjoy the minimum civilised standards for which we surely all ought to be fighting, enforcement needs to be strengthened, including in the ways that I have suggested.

3.8 pm

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield) (Lab): It is not often that former Ministers are present in debates such as this, not to defend themselves, but to think aloud about where we should take things.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty) said that he would give the minimum wage two out of three; I would give it three out of three. That is not because I was the Minister responsible for it or because I am totally loyal to the Government, which I am on two counts—one historical and one factual—but because, 10 years ago, a debate such as this would have been about the principle of the minimum wage and whether it is a viable option in a modern labour market. That argument has been won. Conservative Members sit over there, but there is absolute, or almost absolute, silence from them. Yet, the Conservative party tries to convince us that it is an anti-poverty party.

We started a campaign to establish the Low Pay Commission, and the national minimum wage is now a reality. Under their contracts, constituents working in Burger King were earning 10p an hour. When there was no work for them to do in the early evening, they had to sit and wait until their employer told them to get back behind the counter. While they were waiting, they got no pay whatever.

When the national minimum wage started, it was £3.60 an hour, which was not a lot of money, but it was better than 10p an hour. The big thing about the minimum wage, however, is that it is not just a minimum wage; it is about the state taking responsibility for its citizens—for workers who are vulnerable, disorganised or unorganised and who do not have the capacity, individually or even collectively, to negotiate better pay and conditions.

Whatever the rate of the minimum wage in the future, it will always be just that—a minimum wage. For many workers at the edges of the labour market, it will always be vulnerable, and there will always be employers who are prepared to undercut it. If we accept that that is the reality, we have to ask what we, as parliamentarians, can do to improve the system in the light of our experience since the implementation of legislation.

Michael Connarty: Everyone in Parliament who followed the minimum wage process from concept to reality will commend my right hon. Friend's efforts to promote it and to tackle issues relating to temporary workers and the working time directive. We all owe him a debt of gratitude, and every worker in the country should realise that.

Mr. McCartney: I thank my hon. Friend for that. I was not being defensive. I was one of many people involved in the process, and the truth of the matter is that I was lucky to be the right person at the right time. Although I was certainly enthusiastic about the job, it was a collective agreement.

The consultation on the Employment Bill will take its course, and I hope that the Government will respond positively to the recommendations that USDAW, Unison, the TUC and others have made to improve its workings. I want, however, to concentrate on the current regime.

We asked HMRC's predecessor to take responsibility for investigation and implementation because it was the one organisation that had the capacity to look at employers who refused to pay the minimum wage on request or as a simple matter of principle. Those were the same employers who refused to introduce minimum health and safety standards and who failed to recognise trade unions, pay appropriate tax and national insurance contributions and do all the other things that a good employer does as a matter of course. HMRC is the one agency that has the capacity, intellectual ability and skills mix to have a relationship with every employer in Britain. It is a powerful tool in implementing a national minimum wage and dealing effectively and quickly with those who refuse to pay it.

First, it was always the intention that every HMRC inspector would have direct or indirect responsibility for ensuring the implementation of the minimum wage. When inspectors check whether VAT, tax or national insurance contributions have been paid, they also have the capacity to check on wage levels, and vice versa. HMRC does not have just a handful of individuals in a region with a particular skill, but a large number of people in each region of the United Kingdom, including Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, who can implement the minimum wage. It uses an army of people, rather than a small number of people within that army, to implement the minimum wage. However, it is worth considering whether it can utilise its resources more effectively.

Secondly, when vulnerable workers think of making a complaint, the first question that they ask themselves is, "What will happen to me?" Nine times out of 10, they are not in a trade union, and nine times out of 10, they are in a part of the economy where the trade unions are disorganised or not organised at all.

Thirdly, regardless of whether workers are married, unmarried or in a relationship of any sort, and regardless of whether they have responsibilities of any sort other than to themselves, we can be sure that their wage will be the only wage that they have.

Mr. David Hamilton: May I make a point about the second issue that my right hon. Friend has raised? In many areas, such as my constituency, the vast majority of employees work in small companies and are often not entitled to join trade unions, because trade unions are not recognised. That is one of the changes that could be made.

Mr. McCartney: I was coming to that—

Mr. Hamilton: Sorry.

Mr. McCartney: No, that is okay. It is more than a fair point. The minimum wage was so important, because it was meant to help workers who could not organise to get a higher rate. We must ensure that we deal effectively with the barriers to making a complaint in the first place. We did that by treating the minimum wage as a day-one right, which could be claimed by the worker themselves or by someone representing them, which is important. In other legislation, we have tried to improve the capacity of unions to get into small and unorganised workplaces, but the unions still have a low base in the low-paid sector, although they are beginning to expand, speak up and speak out.

On a daily basis, the practical truth is that workers will still be on their own. That is why HMRC and the Gangmasters Licensing Authority are important. Now that we have established those bodies, we may have to look at ways to bring them together more effectively—in a single agency or whatever—so that they have the capacity to intervene immediately when an employee or group of employees makes a complaint about their wages.

It is important that those who decide not to pay up immediately in keeping with the regulations face a further penalty. Workers should be entitled not only to back pay, but to compensation. That is vital, given the trouble that people go to simply to claim the minimum wage. Few of them are in a trade union, so all communication—whether it is telephone calls or whatever—involves a cost to them. There is the cost to them in terms of worry and concern, and there is also the cost of trying to borrow money from somebody else when their employer does not pay them the wages to which they are entitled and which they need to meet their bills. They can be hard-working, but they can still be unable to meet their bills. So getting back the £300, £400 or even the thousands of pounds that people are owed is not enough; we need to see whether there should be a compensation package. I hope that the Government will consider introducing in the Bill the capacity not only to repay people where they have been underpaid, but to compensate them.

[Mr. McCartney]

We could debate that issue and related issues for a long time, but I know that other colleagues want to come in. However, the fact that we are having a debate shows that we still have a Labour party in Parliament that remembers where it came from, where it is going and where it needs to get to in a disciplined fashion. The longer we keep the Government where they are, the more vulnerable workers will become less vulnerable and the more workers who are being underpaid will get the minimum wage. It is critical that that happens.

The publication of information on the minimum wage raises several key issues. First, few workers understand their rights. Secondly, few can calculate what their wage should be. Thirdly, in industries where workers are vulnerable, few of those who take up work get a contract of employment that is worth the name or which informs them of their rights. Fourthly, when workers get information, it is often confused or not adequate to help them assess whether they are getting the minimum wage.

The Low Pay Commission should, therefore, have a statutory right to amend the relevant regulations to ensure that we have a different form of payslip. Workers should be entitled to a basic minimum payslip designed by the Low Pay Commission. They should be able to use their first payslip to calculate whether they are receiving the minimum wage. On the back of that payslip, there should be information about the hotline and about where people can go if they believe that their employer has miscalculated their wages.

We should take responsibility away from the unions, the employer and the employee and put an easy reckoner on the payslip to show whether the minimum wage has been paid and, if not, how people can get back the money that has been stolen by their employer. If we were to take that step, we could help hundreds of thousands of workers a year.

It would be a mistake if we went to court in the end. I would rather see the money spent on investigations. I would rather put money back in people's pockets than spend hundreds of thousands of pounds of scarce resources on taking employers to court, when they might just bunk off in the end—many of them would do that. We have to take measures to deal with this issue as part of a prevention strategy, rather than a strategy to deal with things once the horse has bolted.

We must improve the role of HMRC and its relationship with other agencies, such as the Gangmasters Licensing Authority. We must put resources into ensuring that workers understand their entitlements from day one, so that they know when they get their first pay packet whether they are being paid the minimum wage to which they are entitled.

3.19 pm

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): It is a tradition to congratulate the hon. Member who secured the debate, and it is usually a formality, but my congratulations and thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) are genuine, because the debate is very timely. We think that the Second Reading of the Employment Bill will be towards the end of June, when the Government will have the opportunity to deal with the range of issues that we are covering. I associate myself, by the way, with what has been said about my right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney); we would not even be having this debate if it were not for his work.

The Employment Bill will enable us to consider the issues of tips, group actions and holiday pay. I hope that Mr. Speaker will allow us to address the issue of the exclusion of those under 21 from employment rights legislation. I want to raise something else, too. Several of us have been involved in the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers campaign on minimum wages for seafarers. We have led a campaign for a decade now in which we have tried to demonstrate that seafarers working on UK-flagged ships are paid at different wage rates because of their race. The European Union intervened, and the Government introduced legislation so that those workers could not be discriminated against on the grounds of nationality. However, many of us thought, "What's the difference?", because employers will still get round the provision and avoid paying people a fair wage.

The concession that the Government made in the Select Committee on Regulatory Reform, which I attended, was that the minimum wage would be paid to all UK seafarers—all workers on UK-flagged ships—when they are in British waters. We thought we had a major victory, and we were about to put out a press release congratulating the Government—a rare thing for me—on their work. Then we got back to the office to discover that the change did not apply to British territorial waters, but to British internal waters, which means it concerns the Norfolk broads. Many routes from this country are not included in the provision, which has enabled shipping companies to avoid paying the minimum wage on a large number of UK-flagged ships, particularly ferries, which is a disgrace in this day and age. We shall table amendments to the Employment Bill.

I hope that we are setting the agenda for the Government, and that in three weeks—I hope it is three weeks—they will table amendments to address the anomalies that we have outlined. Also, I think that hon. Members have today constructively demonstrated how the system can be improved to achieve the original objectives that we all—certainly on the Labour Benches—supported when the minimum wage was proposed. I concur with the criticism about those who are under age, and so on, and we can deal with that in the Bill, if we are creative enough in drafting amendments.

Whatever improvements we get will be irrelevant, however, unless we have the resources to enforce the minimum wage. I chair the Public and Commercial Services Union parliamentary group, which is an all-party group. The union has welcomed the minimum wage, and it is PCS members who enforce it. They welcomed the statement in 2006 by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer about increasing resources by 50 per cent. and the statement by the Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs that there had been a £3 million increase in the overall budget. Ministerial statements have been superb, but the delivery at management level has not reflected the political statements and commitments that we have been given. For example, the budget in question was frozen for a period before the additional money was made available—management froze it as part of an overall review of departmental resources. One of the statements made by Government was that there would be 20 additional compliance officers. First, none were in place by April 2007 and only 17 had been recruited by 2007-08.

We have been asking questions about where the £3 million has gone. The figures show that the HMRC budget devoted to national minimum wage enforcement in 2006 was £6.3 million, and that that went up to £6.7 million in 2007-08. Only £6.5 million was spent, which does not reflect a £3 million increase in resources. We have looked at the BERR budget with reference to promotional work, but it only accounts for an increase of £200,000. Again, it seems that because of managerial decisions made within the Department, the money that was awarded at the political level has been swallowed up elsewhere and has certainly not been applied to front-line staff to implement policies. In order to extract information, the unions have submitted freedom of information requests about the budgetary disbursement of resources.

The key issue is to use the opportunity presented by the Employment Bill to bring together the agenda of improvements, to put right the issues that we are concerned about and to continue the pressure to increase the minimum wage, now that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield has said, we have established the principle and shot down all the arguments about the cost to jobs. However, we must, when we make policy here, make sure that the resources are available, and that they are well and consistently managed, to enable the policies to be carried out. In that matter, members of the PCS who are working on the front line are not confident that the management of resources will ensure that that policy is implemented, which is something that I am sure all Labour Members want.

3.25 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Not just formally, but genuinely, I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz), on introducing an important subject through a combination of serious policy argument and some powerful anecdotes to support his case. He has been well supported by his colleagues—particularly the hon. Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty), who had direct experience of low-paid work in his younger life, and the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) and the right hon. Members for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) and for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), all of whom have been involved in the trade union movement.

The starting point of the speech by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith was that the minimum wage has been a success—I think that that is right; it has been a success, despite great scepticism when it was introduced. I own up to being one of those who was somewhat sceptical about how it would work, but it has worked well because it is well designed and because it is supported by the independent Low Pay Commission. For that reason, certainly in the eight years for which I have been my party's spokesman on Trade and Industry and then Treasury matters, I have been happy to support the national minimum wage and the upgrades to it.

We can see the products of the minimum wage's success at several levels. One, although I know that the hon. Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk is sceptical about it, is the clear evidence that for people at national minimum wage level there has been a much more substantial increase in earnings in the past eight years; I think the figure is 53 per cent. as against 40 per cent. with respect to average earnings. The differential, therefore, between people at the bottom and people in the middle has narrowed. Of course, there is the problem of the people at the top, but that is an argument for another day. Large numbers of workers are now less dependent on benefits—they earn a decent income, or at least a survivable one, based on their own labour. It has also been important—this was the issue on which much of the scepticism centred—that unemployment has not been a consequence of the minimum wage, as it was with badly designed systems in, for example, France. All those elements make a successful policy.

The debate, however, is about enforcement, and it is important to set out why an effective enforcement regime is important—it is obviously important for the workers concerned. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith has mentioned that £27 million has been retrieved for workers who were being cheated out of their wages. The problem is increasing: as I understand the Government's figures, the arrears on minimum wage cases now average £214 in the past financial year, as against £130 in the previous year. A lot of money is at stake for the people concerned.

Enforcement is also important for employers. We tend to forget that large numbers of employers, however reluctantly, comply with the law, and there is nothing worse than a competitor down the road who is cheating. It is for their sake, as well as for the workers', that we need an effective enforcement regime.

Mr. McCartney: That is an important factor in relation to compliance; businesses, small or otherwise, who have to compete in an open market do not want to be undercut by another employer either on wages or other conditions. That is why compliance is an issue not only for employees, but for maintaining the support of the employers who comply.

Dr. Cable: That is my point, which the right hon. Gentleman has made trenchantly and correctly.

Compliance is also of importance to the Government because, as the right hon. Member for Oxford, East has hinted, if many companies are not willing to comply with the law, including criminal sanctions on the minimum wage, they are probably not complying on many other matters. He has mentioned health and safety regulation in particular, but that applies to paying tax and complying with immigration rules. I understand that there is now an integrated enforcement system involving the former Department of Trade and Industry, Customs and Inland

[Dr. Cable]

Revenue, and I should like to know whether there is a systematic way of looking at companies that are flagrantly in breach in terms of their overall compliance with the law. Is information pooled between Government agencies? It would be a much more effective deterrent to companies than a £200 fine, however necessary that is, to know that Government agencies will come down on them like a ton of bricks regarding their other obligations—in particular, tax. How effectively do agencies co-ordinate regarding companies that do not comply?

On enforcement, I want to ask about a particular issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) has obtained information on the number of closed cases in which non-compliant companies had arrears. I think that the number was more than 14,000 cases for 2006-07, of which only three cases have been prosecuted. No cases have been prosecuted since the new system of inter-agency co-ordination was introduced in 2006. Why have there been only three prosecutions? It could be because the system is so brilliantly successful that the authorities have no need to enforce prosecutions, as everything has been done happily and voluntarily, but I suspect that there is a reluctance to bring prosecutions. Why have so few prosecutions ever been taken to the final stage?

The right hon. Member for Makerfield has said that the Government are coming forward with new powers under a Bill. We should discuss some of the ideas in that package, most of which seem very sensible. They include the proposed £200 statutory fine per worker for abuses of the regulation—that is a civil penalty—and a proposal, which has not been discussed yet, that workers who have lost their minimum wage entitlement should be compensated at current, and not historical, pay rates, which would make a substantial difference.

Another proposal from the right hon. Member for Makerfield, which the Government have not accepted, is that compensation should be paid. There has been some discussion about whether there should be interest payments on arrears, because otherwise employers are effectively obtaining interest-free loans from their workers. The trade union side has proposed that interest should be paid, which seems right in principle, and I am not sure why the Government are reluctant to accept that. I know that we are in a consultation process, but will the Minister say a little more on why the Government are so reluctant to go down that road?

My final point on enforcement illustrates some of the difficulties. I saw from a table that the Government produced in response to a parliamentary question that the number of enforcement officers in Wales is eight, which is the number in Northern Ireland, whereas the number for the whole of London is nine. There are seven times as many people in London, which also has a concentration of ethnic minority employees and employers, and it is unclear how the allocation of enforcement officers is decided. Is it decided by accident, or as a result of the difficulties of recruiting people in London? Perhaps the Government should focus on how effectively to allocate the scarce resources at their disposal to ensure that people who are deprived of the minimum wage can claim it.

3.34 pm

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): It is a great pleasure to have you in the Chair, Dr. McCrea. I think that you also participated in the last debate that I attended in Westminster Hall, on HMRC matters. It is a pleasure to congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing the debate, which has been useful and passionate at times, and which has helped to flush out one or two important issues.

Several hon. Members have mentioned the position of the Conservative party. We have supported the principle of the minimum wage for eight years, and the concerns that we had before its introduction were widely held. Indeed, the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) expressed some scepticism, as he has said. We were concerned that a minimum wage set at a high level would endanger jobs. It is difficult to argue against the proposition that the minimum wage endangers jobs at some point, but the independent Low Pay Commission has been successful in balancing those dangers against the ability to increase pay for low-paid workers.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty) argued for a substantial increase in the minimum wage. If he were still in his seat, I would suggest to him that there would be difficulties in doing that. None the less, recognising the principle behind the minimum wage, the fact that the legislation exists is, in itself, a reason why it should be enforced. People should abide by the law as a matter of course, but it does benefit employees whose wages have increased.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Twickenham raised an issue that I was going to raise. Enforcement and compliance with the law are important for employers who abide by the law, who would be undercut and faced with unfair competition if rogue employers were flouting the law and were therefore able to undercut those other employers. That is an important issue. The Conservatives support calls for effective enforcement of the existing national minimum wage.

We have heard that there have been few prosecutions regarding the national minimum wage. I expect that the Minister will say, by way of explanation, that when employers are found not to have complied with the national minimum wage, they rectify the position and pay money in arrears, so there is no need for prosecution. Today is not the day to debate the detail of the Employment Bill, which the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) has mentioned. The Minister and I have just spent the best part of two days debating HMRC's powers more generally and we have not finished yet, so I do not want to go through a detailed analysis of the proposals that might be in the Employment Bill. However, I ask the Minister to consider whether the low number of prosecutions is in any way due to HMRC's lack of power to enforce the national minimum wage.

There are other indications that there might be problems. We have heard about the level of arrears, and we have statistics from the Office for National Statistics on the number of people who are not receiving the national minimum wage. To what extent does the Minister think that the absence of adequate powers at HMRC has caused the problem? Has it been more to do with HMRC's resources?

I shall not speak at length about the problems that HMRC faces—we debate them fairly regularly—but clearly there are issues of low morale in HMRC. It faces very challenging budgets and, as a whole, it is suffering from a tightening of the belt. We heard reference to the increased expenditure announced in the 2006 pre-Budget report for tackling failure to comply with the national minimum wage, but to what extent has that aspect of HMRC's expenditure been immune from any Gershon savings, or is it not possible to analyse it in that way? To what extent has the expenditure been ring-fenced, and have the pressures that undoubtedly have been felt in HMRC in general also been felt with regard to enforcing the national minimum wage?

We should not consider the HMRC issue in isolation. Whether in this Room or elsewhere, we have debated VAT repayments, tax credits and other important issues, in respect of which there is serious concern about HMRC's performance. One reason why I am grateful to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith is that he has highlighted this issue as needing to be addressed.

I seek from the Minister more information on the difficulties in enforcing the minimum wage. For example, have any particular groups been affected? Other hon. Members mentioned migrant workers. Anecdotally, we often hear about eastern Europeans doing agricultural work who are being exploited. My hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) would not want me to highlight eastern European migrant workers in particular. I am referring to migrant workers from throughout the world. Are particular sectors, locations or migrant groups especially affected?

I would be grateful if the Minister touched on an issue that "Panorama" highlighted—accommodation or transport costs being deducted from the wages of migrant workers in particular. The employers are apparently complying with the national minimum wage, but in reality what ends up in the pockets of the workers is substantially below it. Can the Minister provide guidance on that?

I return to the rate of the national minimum wage. As I have said, the Low Pay Commission has worked well, partly because of its independence. It takes representations and then makes an assessment of the level of the minimum wage. However, we saw in the debate about the 10p rate of income tax that one proposal that was clearly considered by the Government was using the minimum wage as a way of trying to compensate those who had lost out as a consequence of the Government's policy. That would appear to be an interference with the way in which the Low Pay Commission works. It would appear to be the Government setting the agenda or giving instructions to the commission, which would be a departure from previous practice.

I cannot help but observe that the trade unions, entirely understandably—this is part of their role—are very strong in calling for substantial increases in the national minimum wage, and the influence of the trade unions on the Labour Government appears to be increasing. I think that 92 per cent. of the funding for the Labour party now comes from trade unions. Therefore, to respond to demands from the trade unions, will the Government put pressure on the Low Pay Commission to increase the national minimum wage above the level that would otherwise be determined?

Mr. David Hamilton: I was getting a bit lost at the end of the hon. Gentleman's argument. Can he provide clarification? Is his party committed to continuing the above-inflation increases—minimum wage though it is—that the Government are putting forward? Is his party in favour of that, or is it moving towards a position from which that will be taken away?

Mr. Gauke: We have no particular desire to change the system. We believe that, over 10 years, the Low Pay Commission has acted in a responsible manner that has not endangered jobs and has benefited low-paid workers. We have no particular desire to change that. I am merely pressing the Government on whether there will be any change in their policy—today of all days, the Government are listening to their Back Benchers—whether it be with regard to the Employment Bill or a range of other matters. I would be grateful if the Minister responded on that point. To conclude, enforcement is important. Particularly at a time of rising fuel bills, food bills and taxes, the national minimum wage should be enforced properly.

3.45 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Dr. McCrea. I do recall the occasion on which we were discussing issues close to your heart. I am sure that we will return to those—perhaps not in an Adjournment debate but certainly in other exchanges.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing the debate; I genuinely mean that. I agree that it is a very important debate. I have been studying with a lot of interest the answers that I have been invited to give to questions, and asking of HMRC many of the questions that have been asked in this Chamber today. Before I give detailed responses to the questions that I have been asked, I just want to say that although my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) sits silently through hours of debate in proceedings on the Finance Bill, he did say that he had had a discussion with our hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin) about low pay and the national minimum wage and they recalled an advert from the Express & Star, which I understand is a newspaper that is widely read in the midlands. The advert, from the early 1990s, was for a security guard and it said:

> "It's £2 an hour and bring your own dog."

I make that point to show how far we have come since employment conditions were of that nature.

I endorse everything that was said about the role that my right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) played in taking the National Minimum Wage Bill through the House of Commons. My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) also played a role, as indeed we all did in bringing in that legislation. I have been in politics a long time and I recall when I was a member of the National Union of Public Employees and we and the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers were in splendid isolation in the TUC in support of a national minimum wage, so from the early 1980s onwards this cause has been dear to my heart. I am delighted that we are here today, asking questions. I am rightly being scrutinised about the implementation and enforcement of this very important measure.

[Jane Kennedy]

The national minimum wage benefits millions of workers, as has been said. The increase in the rates every year benefits more than 1 million people, who see their pay increase as a direct result of the increase in the national minimum wage. I am pleased, but not surprised, that despite the dire predictions of 10 years ago, the minimum wage has become an accepted feature of our labour market and is supported by the majority of employers. That is a welcome sea change in attitude.

Of course, the success of the minimum wage is not just about the fact of it or its level; it depends largely on effective enforcement, as non-compliance undermines its objective—a point that the hon. Members for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) reinforced. The objective of the minimum wage is to enable workers to see real benefits from their labour in their wage packets. That is why we introduced it, and it is important, therefore, that compliance be policed effectively and non-compliance dealt with rigorously.

Since the national minimum wage was introduced in 1999, HMRC has identified more than 4,000 employers, and compliance teams found compliance in only 1,649 of those cases. I beg your pardon, Dr. McCrea, that was wrong; I shall put it right for the record. HMRC has identified more than £30 million in wage arrears since 1999. Last year alone, more than 4,000 employers were looked at. I am glad that I spotted my mistake; it was a major understatement of HMRC's work. HMRC found non-compliance in 1,649 of those cases, which represents nearly £3.9 million in arrears for more than 19,000 workers. HMRC is identifying non-compliance and punishing it, but I realise that there is more to do. That is why the funding available for enforcement has been increased. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who is not in his place—I see that he is speaking in the main Chamber—spoke of the 50 per cent. increase in resources over four years.

It is important that I outline HMRC's approach to enforcement and respond to a number of issues raised during the debate. We have heard that enforcement is based on 16 regional compliance teams. There is also a helpline, based in the north-east, that workers or third parties can call. Employers who might not be paying the minimum wage are generally identified through complaints to the helpline or through risk assessments. Last year, the helpline received more than 46,000 calls, of which more than 2,800 were complaints about possible underpayment.

The compliance teams have a range of strategies for dealing with enforcement. They also use an approach of targeted enforcement, focusing on sectors in which non-compliance is likely. I was asked to illustrate what sectors they might be. It is not only migrant workers who are exploited; other sectors, too, are at a high risk. In recent years, they have included hairdressing—we keep returning to that—child care and the hotel sector. HMRC will raise awareness in those sectors by providing information to workers and ensuring that employers know what they should do to comply. HMRC also investigates a number of employers from the chosen sector in order to check that the risk assessment remains appropriate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith asked why it takes so long to pursue cases and whether that is caused by a lack of resources. I asked HMRC whether the resources that it applies to enforcement are sufficient, and I was advised that they are. The way in which HMRC allocates resources for national minimum wage enforcement is constantly kept under review.

Mark Lazarowicz: I am sure that that is what my right hon. Friend has been told. All that I can say is that my constituent was told by the person to whom she spoke that there was big backlog. Perhaps that member of staff had a particular problem, but from what I have picked up anecdotally I suspect that it was not a one-off case. There is evidence of a heavy work load, and I ask my right hon. Friend to look again at ways of assessing whether the resources are equal to the work load and to the demand for the service.

Jane Kennedy: One of the benefits of debates such as this is that I can assure the House that I shall test the advice that I have been given. I undertake to do so.

We heard that in the 2006 pre-Budget report the then Chancellor, now my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, announced an increase of £2.9 million a year for enforcement. The focus of HMRC's campaigns is raising awareness of the national minimum wage and the current rates in order to ensure that workers and employers know where to go for advice or to make a complaint about possible non-payment. An outreach bus has visited more than 60 locations over nine weeks. It reached more than 700,000 workers directly, and the outreach team handed out more than 130,000 leaflets and spoke to almost 90,000 people. The outreach bus route was planned to enable HMRC to reach as many of those who needed to know about the minimum wage as it could, based on what it knows about the areas of risk. Calls to the helpline that required translation increased during that campaign by more than 400 per cent.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): The Minister has partly answered my question. From reports, the outreach service was met more favourably in some localities than others. Was that generation of additional work so significant that the Department believes that it would be a good idea to repeat the process?

Jane Kennedy: HMRC regards its awareness-raising role as a significant part of enforcing the national minimum wage.

I want to share with the House an important part of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux report entitled "Rooting out the Rogues", which was published on 30 November. Hon. Members may be aware of it. NACAB said:

"we have repeatedly suggested that there needs to be an alternative way of tackling the exploitation of vulnerable workers by unscrupulous or 'rogue' employers—one that does not rely on individual workers entering into a stressful, costly and potentially damaging legal confrontation with their employer".

It went on to state:

"we have argued that the more proactive enforcement regime associated with the National Minimum Wage—one based on carefully targeted inspections of suspect employers by HMRC, as well as on the investigation of individual, anonymous and third party complaints—should be extended to cover all basic statutory workplace rights."

We established our largely inspection-based approach precisely because we did not want workers to have to rely on the approach referred to—doing exactly what the constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith did, and putting themselves at risk by taking action against the employer. I was pleased to see NACAB's endorsement of our approach.

There is never enough time, Dr. McCrea, in debates of this nature to deal with all the points that hon. Members raise. There are well over 1 million employers in the UK. One can see from the figures that the vast majority comply, seeking to treat their employees fairly and properly. Changing HMRC's risk-based approach to one in which it regularly visits each employer—as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins)—would divert resources away from those most likely to be non-compliant. HMRC is right to believe that that would not be an effective method of improving minimum wage enforcement.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield and the hon. Member for Twickenham asked about HMRC's dedicated enforcement teams. Those teams work closely with their tax, national insurance, VAT and Customs colleagues. Information is appropriately shared, given the debate about protection of information, but when necessary, it is shared. Indeed, a number of risk-assessed cases are initially identified by other staff in HMRC—for instance, by those involved in pay-as-you-earn taxation or tax credit information.

I am running out of time, Dr. McCrae, and there are many other points that I wish to address. With permission, I shall do so in writing. On occasion, we are in danger of talking down the success of the national minimum wage and the good work done by HMRC. I commend the officers of HMRC, who take their enforcement role seriously and take their work forward very thoroughly.

Tattooing and Skin Piercing

4 pm

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): The number of people undertaking a tattoo or body piercing is increasing year on year. Ears, tongues, lips, eyebrows, navels and sexual organs are now routinely pierced. More extreme body modifications, such as the creation of patterned scars and the insertion of items such as ball bearings under skin, are also taking place.

High standards of cleanliness and disease control are of the utmost importance in piercing and tattooing. One mistake can have consequences both severe and permanent. Blood-borne infections, such as HIV and the more dangerous hepatitis B and C, pain, severe scarring and even death can result. Many working in the industry are increasingly concerned that legislation and regulation have not evolved to cover the ethical and medical problems that need to be addressed.

In preparation for this debate, discussions have taken place with a range of local authorities in England and Wales, with professional tattooists and piercers and with Professor Noah at the department of epidemiology and population health at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, all of whom want the industry to be better regulated to protect the public as well as the livelihoods and reputations of professional tattooists and body piercers. I was asked initially to look into the need for improved regulation and standards in the field by the union GMB, whose members include a small group of tattooists and piercers. I was joined in carrying out research among local authorities by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble), whose support and interest in the issue I wish to put on record.

Local authorities outside London have powers to regulate acupuncturists and businesses providing tattooing, semi-permanent skin colouring, cosmetic piercing and electrolysis under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 as amended by the Local Government Act 2003. The legislation provides for the registration of practitioners and premises and the observance of byelaws relating to the hygiene and cleanliness of the practitioner, premises and equipment used.

In September 2007, the Department of Health issued a combined set of model byelaws for local authorities covering cosmetic piercing and semi-permanent skin colouring businesses. However, the speed at which changes take place in the industry means that as soon as I began my research, the vast majority of local authorities to which I spoke called for greater strength and scope in the model byelaws. Although local authorities acknowledge that they can develop individual interpretations of the model byelaws and their own unique way of doing things, and although I found some truly excellent practice with very high standards, in other areas such standards were not in place. The result is a postcode lottery of public protection. Similar comments were made about byelaws issued by the devolved Administrations.

Most local authorities have some system of registering tattooing and piercing businesses. The exact nature of that system varies from area to area. There is no nationally agreed standard for inspection. Consequently, some authorities carry out tougher inspection and licensing regimes than others. For example, Cardiff city council's licensing system involves prior operating approval before a licence is granted. Then, depending on their assessed risk rating, premises receive a proactive inspection under the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974. Premises receive an annual re-licensing and health and safety visit, but other authorities have much simpler registration systems with no conditions attached other than compliance with byelaws.

[Mrs. Madeleine Moon]

Common consensus agrees that the guidance in the model byelaws is not detailed enough. More precise guidance was called for to cover types and storage of equipment, the use of disinfectants and anaesthetics, age limits, consent forms and aftercare advice. Those involved in piercing sexual organs are unable to provide anaesthetics. I am advised by Professor Noah that surface applied anaesthetics that freeze the area are more likely to cause pain than to prevent it. The risk of infection after piercing increases with moisture, friction or lower levels of cleanliness, all of which apply to intimate body parts.

There are calls for clarity about sterilisation equipment and which chemicals should be used to clean premises. Many call for needles to be single use only and for autoclaves to be made compulsory. I was advised by Professor Noah that, despite the wide range of chemicals available, using bleach to clean studios and 70 per cent. alcohol to clean piercings or tattoos, as well as basic hand washing by practitioners, should be standard requirements.

Given the popularity of tattooing and piercing, there is a worrying lack of public awareness of the potential risks involved in those procedures. Practitioners have no legal obligation to advise people of possible risks or side effects, check medical histories or give appropriate advice on aftercare. Scarring after infection of a pierced area can be dramatic.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Meg Munn) has worked with Dan Aid on the issue of checking medical histories. Christina Anderson, an inspiring woman, set up Dan Aid after her son Daniel died of septicaemia after having a lip piercing at age 17. Daniel had a severe heart condition that put him at increased risk of developing complications. He was not told of the risks and therefore denied the opportunity for informed consent.

To protect both practitioners and clients, before every tattoo or piercing, the piercer or tattoo artist should take the time to sit down with the client and run through a detailed checklist covering medical history and potential infection risks. The client should be required to sign confirmation that they have been given advice and a leaflet with advice about aftercare. The process would help to protect clients and practitioners because, when a piercing becomes infected, people often complain but do not remember being given aftercare advice. Records should be kept of the procedures carried out and the advice provided. Aftercare advice is important to avoid bacterial infection, especially in the cartilage in the ear, which is difficult to treat with antibiotics. Simple advice about not removing scabs or using 5 per cent. alcohol solutions as disinfectant is needed, as wetting wounds with 5 per cent. alcohol increases the chances of infection.

We do not ask our doctors and nurses for their qualifications when they treat us; we take it for granted that they cannot practise without the qualifications and skills needed. Yet those who carry out tattooing and body piercing do so without needing a minimum qualification. When a tattooing or piercing business is registered, inspections are made of the equipment and the standard of the premises, but there is no way to assess practitioners' competence. That is worrying, because the growth in popularity of tattooing and piercing and the more extreme piercings and so-called body modifications means that more untrained and inexperienced people are entering a trade where high profits can be made, especially from more extreme piercing and body modifications.

At the inquest for her son Daniel, Christina Anderson was informed that in having his lip pierced, he had had a minor operation. People are unknowingly submitting themselves to minor operations, sometimes in back rooms, and local authorities have no idea whether a practitioner is competent to carry out such procedures. All piercings are regulated in the same way; at the moment, there is no gradation of piercing. Anyone who pierces ears can pierce anywhere else on the body.

Opinions vary as to the best method of ensuring that people are adequately qualified. Consultation is needed, but options include a recognised college course of one or two years or apprenticeship for a similar period. Both those methods of training would need to include aspects of anatomy, hygiene, disease control, the operation of equipment, health care and significant practical components.

There is no statutory age limit for piercing, and intimate piercings can be carried out at any age. Under sexual offences legislation, genital, navel or nipple piercings on someone under 16 might be regarded as indecent assault, but I found no evidence of prosecutions. We know that such piercings have taken place without parental consent or involvement, some of which have become infected and needed serious medical intervention to protect the life of the young person. I fear, therefore, that there is a lack of protection for minors. Local authorities have complained that, in reality, the most that they can do is revoke the licence of a person who has carried out such a piercing. Tattooing a butterfly on to the arm of a 13-year-old is illegal, but piercing the same person in a genital area is not. That cannot be right. It is time for us to set legally enforceable age limits on any piercing other than of the earlobe.

So far, I have talked about tattooing and piercing parlours, but home-based piercing and tattooing is an emerging problem. The sale of equipment over the internet to unregistered persons and premises is fuelling this problem, as increasing profits are to be made. I am advised that social networking sites carry contacts for unregistered tattooists and piercers selling their services, and legislation is needed to bring such home-based practitioners into the registration system. It is incredible to think so, but home-based piercing parties take place in some communities involving people with no training, qualifications or skills.

Both practitioners and regulators have called for stronger, clearer, more detailed and more precise guidance and byelaws, and many experts and professionals would be more than happy to engage with the process. I understand that Graham Martin and the Tattooing and Piercing Industry Union's working group have already done much of the necessary work and produced their own model byelaws based on modifications of the Scottish Parliament's model. That would enable best practice to be rolled out across the UK and provide valuable support to environmental health departments that already do so much good work ensuring public safety.

A national system of licensing is required. Byelaws should specify which type of equipment is acceptable for use and give advice on chemicals and local anaesthetics. They should also include an obligation to ascertain the age and medical history, a consent form and information and obtain on the potential risks associated with any procedures and give accurate aftercare advice. As already stated, such changes could be potentially life saving.

I have commented already on the need for qualifications for those carrying out such interventions. An age limit must be introduced for body piercing with the more intimate and extreme piercings reserved for over-18s, which would give local authorities greater power to protect minors. Everyone would benefit from tightening regulation in this area. The public would be protected as would the excellent and reputable tattoo artists and body piercers who want to see their industry and their livelihoods protected.

I am aware that Professor Noah, and some of his colleagues from the Health Protection Agency, have produced a paper on the hazards of body piercing, based on a survey, which will be published in the British Medical Journal very soon. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that that is read and considered by the Department of Health so that we can begin to move forward and provide the level of protection so urgently required for those individuals. Many of us in this House might not understand the motivation for wanting some of the more extreme body piercings and tattoos, but in undertaking such practices, people should be protected by the law as are those going into hospital for minor surgery.

4.14 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) on her success in securing this debate and apologise for the fact that I am substituting for the Minister with responsibility for public health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Dawn Primarolo), who is detained by her responsibilities during the Committee stage of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend for setting out her views on the dangers of tattooing and other types of skin piercing, and on the regulatory framework. As she indicated, tattooing or skin piercing carried out incorrectly and in an unhygienic manner can result in a variety of problems, such as local wound infections or serious blood-borne viral infections such as hepatitis B, hepatitis C or even HIV. However, most complications are minor and self-limiting, such as local, minor wound infections that might not be caused by the piercing procedure itself.

As far as we know, serious complications are uncommon according to peer-reviewed literature, but none the less it is important that we have measures in place to ensure public protection, as my hon. Friend said. We have a legislative framework in place and, under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982, local authorities have powers to regulate the practice not only of piercing, but acupuncture, tattooing and other cosmetic activities. In 2003, we strengthened the Act by giving local authorities powers to regulate body piercing and semi-permanent skin-colouring businesses. That legislation provides for local authorities to require the registration of practitioners and premises offering such services, and to introduce local byelaws relating to hygiene and cleanliness.

Local authorities inspect businesses under that legislation, usually based on a local risk assessment, and it is an offence to provide these services without being registered with the local authority or to breach local byelaws. As my hon. Friend will know, in London, the legislative framework is different in that local authorities have chosen to use private legislation to regulate businesses by licensing and inspection. Under licensing provisions in London, local authorities may set conditions under which a licence is granted to cosmetic body-piercing businesses. Again, offences are connected with non-compliance.

In addition, local authorities can use general enforcement powers under health and safety at work legislation, which provides useful flexibility and added protection for the public. That legislation enables local authorities to use improvement and prohibition notices, and ultimately to prosecute cosmetic body piercing businesses, if they judge that there is a risk to customers' health and safety. Health and safety at work legislation will also apply to other procedures such as scarification and beading.

All that legislation of course applies to people offering tattooing and skin piercing for gain from their homes, not just in commercial premises. In 2007, the Department published an updated model byelaw, which has been well received by local authorities according to the feedback received. For example, Mid Sussex district council recently introduced updated model byelaws provided by the Department to assist local authorities, and stated:

> "The new byelaws are good news for the people of Mid Sussex because they give environmental health officers the powers they need to protect public health."

We have not received representations from local authorities or practitioners about the effectiveness of the current legislative framework.

My hon. Friend suggested that the byelaws should be more detailed, but they do provide a framework for hygienic practice, and we believe that details of hygienic practice and other matters are better covered in guidance by the Health and Safety Executive on enforcement in respect of skin-piercing activities. The guidance covers the issues that she raised, such as pre-consultation with the client, infection control, cleaning, disinfection and sterilisation, aftercare advice, anaesthetics and enforcement.

As my hon. Friend mentioned, the Department has funded new research by the HPA, which has investigated the prevalence and types of body piercing in those aged 16 and over in England and has estimated the proportion of piercings that result in health complications and the proportion of piercings that result in professional help and advice being sought. As she rightly said, that report is due to be published this Friday. However, after she secured this debate, I asked to see some of its draft findings, and without pre-empting too many of its conclusions, I thought that I would give her a foretaste, given her interest in the matter.

[Mr. Ben Bradshaw]

Some of the findings are interesting. The prevalence of cosmetic body piercing, excluding earlobes, but including the upper ear cartilage, in adults aged 16 and over is 10 per cent. Body piercing was more common among women than men and among younger age groups. Nearly half the women aged between 16 and 24 who were surveyed reported having had piercings. Some 33 per cent. of piercings were at the navel, followed by 19 per cent. at the nose, 13 per cent. at the ear, 9 per cent. at the tongue, 9 per cent. at the nipple, 8 per cent. at the eyebrow, 4 per cent. at the lip, 2 per cent. at the genitals and 3 per cent. at some other part of the body.

My hon. Friend may also be interested to know that the anatomical sites used for piercings varied by gender. Among women, the most common piercings were, in order, of the navel, the nose, the ear, the tongue, the eyebrow, the nipple and the lip. Among men, they were the nipple, the eyebrow, the ear, the tongue, the nose, the lip and the genitals. Thus, nipple piercing was the most popular among men but one of the least popular among women, and navel piercing was by far the most popular among women, accounting for more than a third of piercings, and much rarer among men. Some of the findings surprised me, and I am sure that they will surprise a lot of hon. Members and members of the public who, like me, are not au fait with the world of body piercing. "Ouch", I said to myself as I read through a lot of that list.

My hon. Friend will also be interested to know that, overall, about 25 per cent. of those pierced reported complications. Among those aged 16 to 24, about 30 per cent. reported complications with piercings and 15 per cent. sought professional help, for example from pharmacists, piercers themselves or GPs. Piercing was much more common in that age group and more likely to have been done in recent years. The most common complications were local infections and bleeding, but serious complications requiring a hospital admission, for example, were extremely rare, at less than 1 per cent. We believe that the research will show that we probably need to do more work to determine the risk of complications and how best they may be avoided.

My hon. Friend expressed her concern about the fact that children can have body piercing done without parental consent, both from the point of view of whether it is appropriate and because of the possible health risks. I emphasise to her that Government policy on the age of consent is the responsibility of the Ministry of Justice, but she will know that the tattooing of minors is controlled by specific legislation. We think that that is appropriate, because of the permanent skin alteration that it involves. However, the piercing of ears and other parts of the body for decorative or cosmetic purposes is lawful. We have taken that judgment because we believe that cosmetic piercing is usually naturally reversible if jewellery is permanently removed from the piercing. There is no statutory minimum age of consent for body piercing or ear piercing. Minors can give valid consent if they are capable of understanding the nature of the act to be carried out. The degree of competence that can be exercised by children depends on the relative maturity of the child concerned as well as upon his or her age.

I understand that some parents feel concerned when their children have body piercing done without their consent. As with many such matters, a lot of the issues involved should be resolved within the family. However, I am advised that it is generally considered good practice by local authorities and by the industry for cosmetic piercing not to be carried out on minors without parental consent. If local authorities receive complaints from parents that that has been done by a particular practitioner, it is open to them to take action using their existing powers. The Health and Safety Executive guidance includes advice on encouraging businesses to adopt a reasonable approach to age of consent issues. Taking a reasonable stance on the age of consent avoids conflict with parents and enhances the reputation of the business. I would helpfully suggest that it also ensures that a business does not run into difficulties with the local authority, which has the responsibilities that I have described.

I am aware that this is a sensitive matter that concerns parents. However, we are concerned that if we introduced a statutory minimum age of consent, we could end up increasing the health risks of cosmetic piercing. Children might be tempted to try to pierce themselves or each other in an unsafe or unhygienic way, or to go to disreputable practitioners. We receive occasional representations on the subject and, as on all matters, keep our policy position under review.

I reassure my hon. Friend that we have a robust legislative framework that provides for local regulation of tattooing and skin piercing businesses. Centrally, the Department assists by providing model byelaws that local authorities can use.

Mrs. Moon: My hon. Friend the Minister has not addressed the issue of qualifications and competency to practice. Will he comment on that in the remaining few minutes and suggest whether the Department has any concerns about it?

Mr. Bradshaw: We are aware of the concerns, and although there are currently no formally recognised qualifications or training courses for body piercing, that is partly because the Government-funded project to develop such standards, of which my hon. Friend may be aware, ended prematurely because of opposition from the industry. We believe that it could have led to the development of formal qualifications.

We believe that progress can most quickly and effectively be made by practitioners, their organisations, industry bodies, training bodies and enforcement authorities working together to agree on suitable standards of good practice and competency. That is the best way forward, rather than our imposing statutory training requirements on the industry.

As I have explained, we recognise that there is concern about the lack of a statutory age of consent for cosmetic piercing, about some of the training standards and about how some local authorities are using our new model byelaws. We keep those matters under careful review and consideration, but we are not persuaded that a statutory age of consent would help. Our concern is that it might have the opposite effect.

Treasury Aims (Quality of Life)

4.26 pm

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I am delighted to introduce the debate.

I have a vivid memory of one of the first economics lectures that I attended during my time at the London School of Economics. The lecturer, the excellent Morris Perlman, who is sadly no longer with us, made clear to the undergraduates right at the beginning the distinction between money and wealth. "Money is pieces of paper or numbers", he said, "but the wealth that you have is the sum of all the things that you value—both the things with a monetary value attached, like your home and possessions, and the things without a price tag, such as relationships, a feeling of security and your health."

It is not just economists. Philosophers, too, contribute to the debate about what we really value. Earlier this year, A. C. Grayling said:

"Happiness is the measure of true wealth".

I shall explore how we can measure that wider definition of the nation's wealth and the implications that it has for policy making. I shall argue that levels of happiness are important, useful and integral to the concept of quality of life, as other Governments around the world, and even Departments other than the Treasury, acknowledge. I shall argue that happiness can be measured reliably and robustly and that the Treasury can and should do practical things to improve the nation's happiness and quality of life.

The Treasury's stated aim is:

"To raise the rate of sustainable growth, and achieve rising prosperity and a better quality of life, with economic and employment opportunities for all."

I commend the Treasury for including a better quality of life in its aim, but I question whether that is taken as seriously as the growth and prosperity aims. Without quality of life being taken into consideration, growth is meaningless. Gross domestic product grows after natural disasters or oil spills, as the clean-up operation is costly, but it obviously does not follow that such events are desirable. If GDP growth comes as a result of our working longer hours, we may find our quality of life negatively affected. A Department of Trade and Industry study in 2004 found that 87 per cent. of employees said that they would like to spend more time with friends and family. If some of those employees were to cut their working hours to see their family more, GDP would fall. Would that be a bad thing, if that decision enhanced their quality of life?

Research clearly shows that our quality of life is not getting better. The world values survey tells us that, if anything, we as a nation are less happy now than we were in the early 1980s. We can go back further using polling evidence from Gallup, which shows that despite increases in GDP, we are less happy even than in the 1950s. Back in 1968, the late Robert Kennedy said in a famous speech:

"There is more to life than GDP."

The debate about the best way for societies to measure progress has continued ever since. The blinkered pursuit of GDP growth on its own can lead to perverse decisions. We should recognise the limitations of pursuing GDP growth and introduce other measures to capture quality of life.

This idea is gaining momentum. Last week, Ipsos MORI dedicated its summer conference to the subject, under the title, "Who's Happy Now?" Governments around the world are looking seriously at going beyond GDP, and not just the Government in Bhutan. Earlier this year the French President, Nicolas Sarkozy, commissioned two eminent economists, Joseph Stiglitz and Amartya Sen, to develop alternative measures of progress to GDP that would better reflect people's well-being. Forty-eight Members from both sides of the House have signed my early-day motion 731, acknowledging static levels of happiness and the need for the Government to measure and address that. The British public agree. In 2006, a BBC-commissioned GfK NOP poll found that 81 per cent. of the British public think that the Government's prime objective should be happiness and not wealth.

As I have mentioned, other Departments are also addressing this issue. In 2002, the Cabinet Office commissioned a paper on the subject, "Life Satisfaction: the state of knowledge and implications for government". Although it was not a statement of policy, the paper declared that:

"There is a case for state intervention to boost life satisfaction due mainly to evidence of direct impacts on life satisfaction of government activities, together with strong evidence of the dependence of individuals' wellbeing on the actions of others."

The paper suggested a range of actions that the Government could take, including at the top of the list:

"the use of life satisfaction data to construct quality of life indices".

Following the 2007 UNICEF study of 20 developed nations, in which children in the UK ranked lowest in terms of happiness and well-being, the Department for Children, Schools and Families has introduced "SEAL classes", or so-called "happiness lessons", in schools. The Department for Communities and Local Government has included subjective well-being measures in its new 2008 national indicators set, which will be used by local authorities to keep track of progress. It is also supporting the Local Wellbeing Project, which is being conducted by the Young Foundation to test practical interventions to improve people's happiness in three local authority areas in the UK. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has started to measure "life satisfaction" as part of its sustainable development indicators, and it has commissioned a sizeable body of research that highlights ways in which Government action could impact on happiness.

I very much welcome these moves. Many Departments are beginning to take the issue seriously. However, to bring all those activities together and co-ordinate what will otherwise be piecemeal efforts, the Treasury needs to take a lead. Sadly, when I raised this subject with the Chancellor in November 2007, while he waxed lyrical about growth and prosperity, he seemed less than serious when he said:

"I am willing to consider a Liberal Democrat happiness index".—[Official Report, 29 November 2007; Vol. 468, c. 428.]

I hope that I am wrong, and that the Treasury has an open mind about creating robust measures of quality of life.

[Jo Swinson]

If the Treasury is to consider measuring quality of life, quality of life obviously needs to be defined. On 22 February, I asked the Chancellor what definition the Treasury is using, and I received this answer from the Financial Secretary to the Treasury:

"Productivity and employment are the key determinants of growth and therefore of living standards. However, a large volume of other data are also important indicators for a broader measure of quality of life, such as those on crime, working hours, social capital, social demography and health." [Official Report, 22 February 2008; Vol. 472, c. 1117W.]

That answer rightly recognises that living standards are not the same as quality of life.

Living standards have certainly increased in recent decades but, as I have said already, quality of life has not. The factors that were listed—

"crime, working hours, social capital…health"— and so on are all important to quality of life, but with such a vague definition, it is not clear how the Treasury can measure overall progress towards its aim of a better quality of life. The answer also misses out how quality of life should be defined—the answer is by asking people. Measuring the subjective well-being of individuals is essential, if we are to know how the quality of life is changing. Asserting that quality of life has increased on a range of sterile indicators is not much use if people do not feel any happier or more satisfied.

Some would argue that happiness cannot be studied or measured accurately. However, science tells us otherwise. Lord Layard, the well respected Labour peer, goes over the evidence that it can be measured at some length in his 2005 book, "Happiness: Lessons from a New Science". He is clear that the answers that an individual gives to subjective well-being questions not only match the answers that friends or independent observers would give about their well-being, but also correlate with scans indicating activity in corresponding parts of the brain.

Furthermore, the Government's own sources suggest that a life satisfaction question is both robust and useful. A DEFRA paper published last year, "Sustainable development indicators in your pocket", states:

"The independent research commissioned by DEFRA concluded that life satisfaction measures should provide reliable information about wellbeing in a policy context."

Of course, just asking people how satisfied or happy they are may be interesting, but it will not help the Government to understand how to enhance quality of life. That is why a range of indicators needs to be developed and correlated over time with the subjective well-being question, so that trends can be established and policies changed accordingly.

There is already a large body of research into the determinants of happiness. A paper commissioned by DEFRA, "Review of research on the influences on personal well-being and application to policy making", which was written by Professor Paul Dolan and others in 2006, gives a comprehensive review of the research that has been conducted so far. In particular, the findings on income and work are interesting. The paper states:

"The majority of individual level studies find a positive association between absolute income and well-being".

We might assume that to be the case, given that most people tend to try hard to increase their income. However, the paper goes on to say:

"The results generally suggest that there are diminishing returns to income i.e. the well-being hit of income falls as income rises."

Beyond a certain point, therefore, policies that prioritise making us richer will not necessarily yield large pay-offs in terms of our happiness.

The Treasury is right to identify employment as a key driver for quality of life, although that is not just about the growth as a result of higher employment, as might be thought. Instead, the same DEFRA paper found that "being unemployed has severe and long lasting negative consequences for life satisfaction and happiness, which cannot be explained only in terms of the loss in income."

The conclusion to be drawn from that is that even when someone who has been unemployed returns to work, they are unhappier than they were before, because the experience of being unemployed increases their feeling of insecurity even while they are in work. I know that, as a Labour Member, the Minister will welcome that finding, which suggests that there should be an even greater focus on ensuring that everyone has a genuine opportunity to work.

Regardless of the level of income, inequality negatively impacts on quality of life. People would rather earn £50,000 in a society where everyone else earns £25,000 than earn £100,000 in a society where everyone else earns £250,000. Therefore, the issue of income inequality is important, so it is especially worrying that according to the Institute for Fiscal Studies and the gini coefficient the gap between the rich and the poor has widened under this Government.

On income and work, it is also important to bear in mind the current personal debt crisis. The evidence shows that while secured debts, such as a mortgage, do not negatively impact on someone's quality of life, large amounts of unsecured debt cause a great deal of worry and unhappiness.

Interestingly, the DEFRA paper also points out that, according to the research, commuting is:

"generally associated with lower levels of life satisfaction and mood."

However, it is rare that Ministers make proud declarations about efforts to cut the average commute of the British citizen. The issue of commuting is not just about congestion: it is about adopting a different approach to how and where we work. Taken in hand with people saying that they want more time with friends and family, the case for moving to more flexible working practices is overwhelming. We need to tackle the culture of presenteeism and use technology to cut out unnecessary commutes, which would also have environmental benefits.

Research points to many other factors that have an impact on happiness. Health is a major one, especially and unsurprisingly as we get older. Locus of control is also a common influencer of life satisfaction; when people feel that decisions are made for them and that they have little influence over the events in their lives, they tend to be unhappier.

All that information should be shaping Government policy, which brings me to the action that the Treasury should take. An Ipsos Mori poll found that 85 per cent. of people in the UK agree that "Policies should put less emphasis on consumption, and more emphasis on other aspects of the quality of life".

In order to prioritise improving quality of life, it is essential to measure it and research what affects it, so the first and most obvious thing to do is to create an index of the nation's happiness. The old adage that "what gets measured gets done" has a ring of truth about it here. No one bothered about GDP 100 years ago, because we did not have the tools to measure it; now it seems to be the obsession of most Governments around the world, although, as I have mentioned, that situation is changing.

A happiness index, including subjective well-being measures and a range of quality of life indicators, would complement GDP as a general measure of progress. It would provide a tangible way of monitoring the Treasury's goal of creating a better quality of life, and it would help to identify the policy levers to enhance happiness in the future. Importantly, it would also provide greater clarity within Government; many Departments now refer to the concepts of "quality of life" or "well-being" in their mission statements, but there is no common measurement.

In developing such an index, the Government should stick to five key principles: the index should be well grounded in the science; it should be conducted at regular intervals; it should have a large sample size; it should be robust and proof against manipulation; and, ideally, it should be part of an international effort to enable comparisons across nations—hence my early-day motion calling for the Government to work closely with the French as the French develop their index.

Even before such an index is created, the Treasury could integrate existing happiness research into its work. The supporting evidence on well-being should be consulted in allocating resources, assessing new policies and deciding priorities. Much as the environmental or budgetary impact of a policy is looked at, the well-being impact should also be considered.

Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): I came to listen to this debate to find out what it was about, to be honest, but I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. Does she agree that if we were to adopt the strategy that she has proposed, there would be a much stronger case for saving local post offices and other services that the Government perhaps do not see as financial priorities?

Jo Swinson: I agree with my hon. Friend. Post offices are a good example of a local service whose social impact and value to the community are not necessarily captured in financial measurements. He has made his point very well.

These proposals are not always about spending more money, the Minister will be glad to hear. Indeed, taking well-being into the equation may sometimes lead to ending practices and projects that cost money, or implementing policies that save money. A cross-departmental approach is crucial, as sometimes the spending will be in one Department and the saving in another. For example, the Layard proposals on mental health to train new cognitive behavioural therapists to help people with depression get back to work will result in savings on incapacity benefits. I am pleased that the Government have taken those ideas on board, but there are many other examples that we are missing out on because we do not measure quality of life in any regular, clear and robust way.

I hope that in her response the Minister will take my views on board and explain whether the Treasury is prepared to look at creating a well-being index for use across Government, and to co-ordinate efforts across Departments to use existing research to improve quality of life, as its mission statement commits it to do.

4.41 pm

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Angela Eagle): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) on securing this debate. I certainly hope that it made her happy. She discussed some issues of economic interest that, obviously, arose from ideas that occurred to her in her first economics lectures—I had similar ideas when I went to my first economics lectures—and some of the philosophical issues that underpin the assumptions that come together to give us our statistics.

Quality of life is obviously a wide issue, and many of the Treasury's core functions improve people's quality of life. As the hon. Lady said, increasing the wealth of individuals in the UK as a whole through gross domestic product is not the only determinant of quality of life, and I assure her that we do not hope and pray for natural disasters in order to see GDP levels rise. I suspect that we are as aware as she is of some of the perverse things that can happen if we apply the measurement of certain statistics with no sense about how we interpret them. It is always important to apply the common-sense test, let alone the happiness test, to the way that economics defines statistics and measures things.

Clearly, GDP does have a role. As we see in many countries without economic development, other factors which determine quality of life—schooling, health, cultural activities, security through policing and the rule of law, for example—are difficult to introduce, let alone safeguard and improve. GDP is a necessary but not sufficient condition for the higher levels of happiness that the hon. Lady aspires to for us all.

GDP is a measure of economic activity. It is generally accepted that it is not a perfect measure of wider welfare. To that extent, I certainly agree with the hon. Lady's analysis. There is a wide body of work in the economics and statistical literature on alternative methods of measuring welfare. Such research has a long history, with early work in the area by Weisman and Stiglitz and, more recently, as she mentioned, by Richard Layard, who has been investigating the economics of happiness. That approach to assessing welfare combines economics with techniques more commonly used by psychologists.

Such research highlights factors other than income which affect well-being. The hon. Lady raised one in particular: the welfare effects of inequality. I well remember learning about bliss points when I was studying welfare economics. She may remember them, too. Obviously, finding society's bliss point is what all Governments wish to do.

The research is interesting, and it provides useful insights. The economics of happiness literature does not purport to replace income-based measures of welfare, but instead complements them with broader measures of well-being. Other work by Metz, Riley and Weale at the National Institute of Economic and Social Research shows that between 1997 and 2002 the real GDP of both France and the UK grew at 2.7 per cent. per annum. However, real income, which they argue is a better measure of welfare, as it relates more directly to resources available for current and future consumption, grew at 3.2 per cent. per annum in the UK compared with just 2.5 per cent. in France. The Government continue to monitor developments in this area and to look at different ways of measuring even familiar concepts.

[Angela Eagle]

Another limitation of GDP as a welfare measure is that it includes paid work but not the unpaid work that we do—I say this as an avowed feminist—and an entire body of feminist literature, which I am always interested in keeping in touch with, demonstrates that. Cooking, cleaning, do-it-yourself, caring for dependants—none of that is measured.

Measuring and valuing unpaid output produced by households in the UK is an important body of research. In 2002, the Office for National Statistics published an experimental household satellite account which measured non-market production by households using the third-party criterion first developed by Margaret Reid in the 1930s; that is, that if someone else could be paid to provide the service, it should be measured. Its experimental estimate for 2000 showed that including such activity would almost double GDP. Clearly, that is an area in which I am extremely interested.

It is also important to note that the standard measure of GDP does not measure degradation of the environment or depreciation of natural resources. The hon. Lady touched on those issues in her wide-ranging remarks. Because it does not measure those things, we as policy makers and people who live on this planet increasingly have to take account of them. The ONS does, however, produce a set of UK environmental accounts that provide information about the environmental impact of economic activity, in particular about the emissions of pollutants, and about the importance of natural resources to the economy.

The hon. Lady is right to emphasise the narrowness of GDP. It is an important measure, but it is by no means the only one. However, using GDP as a measure of economic activity does have three advantages: it is a well-developed measure, it is easily understood, and it is compiled using a set of internationally agreed definitions.

Before I go into any more detail, I want to deal with a couple of points that the hon. Lady raised, particularly whether we should create an index of happiness. Such an index would be useful for policy making, and Her Majesty's Treasury does follow research developments in this area, particularly the work of Richard Layard. However, GDP is still important and it is a better developed measure, but that does not mean that we rule out for all time the development of more sophisticated measurements.

The hon. Lady might want to engage with the now independent ONS, which would have to develop methodologies and have contacts internationally to be able to see whether work could be pushed forward on developing the wider measures of well-being and quality of life that she seeks.

Jo Swinson: I am enjoying the Minister's comments and I welcome much of what she has said, but I would like to push her slightly further. She said that GDP is a better developed method of measurement, which is obvious, but rather than waiting for more sophisticated measures of happiness and well-being to appear suddenly on the scale, will the Treasury take a proactive role in helping to develop them, including internationally?

Angela Eagle: We are interested in a more sophisticated understanding of the effects of economic and other human activity. Including the 50 per cent. of people whose work is often not counted—the unpaid area of the economy is a case in point—sustainability, the pricing and use of finite resources, and other externalities such as pollution when we measure and account for what we do, is clearly important as we enter an era in which we must re-engineer our economies to ensure sustainable economic activity that does not do more damage than good to the planet. To understand, for example, how carbon footprints are affected by activity, we must measure the whole-life carbon costs of those activities.

The science and this area of economics is in need of rapid development, if I may put it that way. In the past, it has not been mainstream; in fact, it has been defined out of the mainstream, as have unpaid work, happiness and welfare economics. The hon. Lady is right to say that all the way through the development of classical economic theory, other strands of study have been pursued by welfare economists. For example, as she said, Nicolas Sarkozy has contacted the Nobel prize-winning economist Amartya Sen, who has done some extremely important work in that field, and I can assure the hon. Lady that the Treasury is well aware of such theoretical developments.

Clearly, we need to see what we can do to ensure that the insights given to us by different ways of measuring and interpreting human activity are incorporated into what we do. Does that mean that we will abandon the measurement of GDP? Of course not. Does it mean that we need quickly to develop internationally agreed methods of measuring the carbon costs of activity? Yes. Does it mean that we could begin to consider whether we can develop the capacity both nationally and internationally to produce what the hon. Lady referred to as a happiness index or some form of quality-of-life measurement that takes on board a wider range of considerations than narrow GDP? Yes. Are we close to developing such an index this instant? No, we are not, and nor are we in a position from which to go forth confidently into international statistical conferences and hope for agreement on such measurement.

It is important, especially when measuring the national account, to use definitions that are agreed internationally, which makes them useful for cross-country comparisons. There are many strands to the work that the hon. Lady described in this fascinating but all-too-brief debate. I do not want to slam the door in any way on the ideas that she has introduced, but a great deal of work needs to be done, nationally and internationally, to get agreement on standards before we can hope to proceed.

I thank the hon. Lady for pursuing these issues, which are important in widening our general understanding of how human economic activity impacts on the societies to which it relates and beyond, to the sustainability of the planet, fairness between genders and fairness between countries. I aspire, like her, to see in the 21st century the narrower view of economics succeeded by a more holistic view that enables us to go forward with analytical tools and measurements, so that we can more appropriately assess the effects of our society's activity. That way, we could make policy decisions in a more sophisticated way than the current narrow economic measurements enable us to do.

The hon. Lady should not throw the baby out with the bath water. I am sure that she recognises that GDP and some of the pure economic ways of measuring things have their place in our society. After all, even neo-classical economics developed the concept of neo-classical endogenous growth theory, which is a clever way of saying that if people are happy at work, they tend to be more productive.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 12 June 2008

[HUGH BAYLEY in the Chair]

European Commission

[Relevant documents: Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions—Annual Policy Strategy 2009—and Chapter 6 of the Eighteenth Report of the European Scrutiny Committee, HC 16-xvi.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. David.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Jim Murphy): I am delighted to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bayley, in today's three-and-a-half-hour debate on this important subject. I thank my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House for proposing the debate as a means of helping the House to achieve better scrutiny of the annual European Commission work plan. That objective is keenly shared by the Government, and I hope that this, the first of what we intend to be annual debates in Westminster Hall on the Commission's annual policy strategy and legislative work programme, will be an important step in how Westminster scrutinises Brussels.

The Commission's annual policy strategy establishes policy priorities for 2009 and identifies the initiatives necessary to realise them. As hon. Members know, the new Commission will be appointed in mid-2009. At that point, it will agree a five-year mandate laying out the broad priorities and aims for the period. It is therefore no surprise that the annual policy strategy is primarily a continuation of existing work streams for the current Commission. It is not a set of formal policy proposals but an aspirational document. The Commission has said that it is aimed at "sparking a debate" with the other institutions on where the policy priorities should lie for the next year. That dialogue is helpful in translating the annual policy strategy into deliverables in the legislative work programme for 2009, which will, of course, be presented in October this year.

The annual policy strategy is nevertheless helpful in a number of ways. It provides a framework for the preliminary draft budget for the corresponding year, as well as an operational steer for the Commission services. It helps the Commission to keep on track, preventing drift and endless new initiatives from dominating a new weekly agenda. The strategy is important also because the broad policy priorities that it focuses on will have an impact on the drafting and implementation of specific legislation and proposals. In Whitehall, such documents are important planning tools to help Departments to plan for negotiations.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) and I discussed earlier, 2009 will bring a new European Parliament and European Commission and, subject to national ratification processes, the entry into force of the treaty of Lisbon. Particularly given that backdrop, Members should see the strategy document as indicative rather than legislative. I hope that we can welcome it as a series of operational measures following our long institutional debate. After our debates on European structures in recent months, it is a pleasure for me to open a debate not on those structures, but on the substance of what Europe can and should be doing in the next year.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Murphy: I was on my final sentence, but I shall happily give way.

Mr. Hollobone: This debate is about the European Commission's annual policy strategy. Is there anywhere in it a commitment from the Commission to get its accounts into such an order that they will finally be approved by independent audit? For more than 10 years, the accounts have failed that test.

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. As I explained in my introduction, the annual policy strategy is not a legislative work programme, but neither is it the annual budget. That will be presented and agreed later in the year. That separate work stream, which is, of course, related to the policy strategy in some ways, needs continuing improvement and transparency, so that there is more confidence in the European Union's budgetary processes here in Westminster and across the whole of Europe. That is an important point, but not directly germane to the document in question.

The debate is an innovation in our practices here in Westminster, and I look forward to it with great relish.

2.35 pm

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): As the Minister knows, the European Scrutiny Committee examined last year's annual policy strategy in detail, not just as a document but as a process. Given that it comes from the European Commission and gives a heads-up of what might be developed into the work programme, we thought, in the spirit in which we have always tried to work, that the earlier that we engaged with the Commission's thoughts, the more likely we were to be able to influence them before they became directives. After that point, it is a struggle to negotiate improvements at a European Council meeting, as the Minister knows. To do so, we sometimes have to surrender some of our bigger ideas or block something because a directive has been structured so badly that it is not acceptable to the UK.

We carried out an inquiry last year into the 2008 annual policy strategy document. We took oral and written evidence, which I hope Members who are interested in European procedures will have taken the trouble to read. We considered that a useful exercise, providing an examination of the Commission's planning process and giving the departmental Select Committees the opportunity to engage in the process at the earliest stages.

We often found that, when something became a directive, that was the first time that departmental Select Committees or those with responsibility engaged with it. As the Minister knows, one of the improvements that we suggested was based on the fact that, although Green Papers and

[Michael Connarty]

White Papers from the Commission were widely consulted on by the Government, they were not sent to Select Committees. Everyone outside the House was consulted, but not the responsible Select Committees. Through the process, we saw errors and made positive recommendations.

As the Minister said, the document is not the Commission's budget, and I am sure that he knows that at our last meeting—not this Wednesday, but the Wednesday before—we discussed the draft budget. We have recommended it for debate, and perhaps those who are interested in the process of audit and accountability will engage with the process in such a debate.

The Committee has considered the 2009 annual policy strategy document, as is reported in our 18th report of Session 2007-08. We examined what was in it and laid out a simple framework for people to look at, hoping that departmental Select Committee members in particular would raise matters with their Departments and engage in the process early on. The document sets out priorities; it does not contain detailed proposals. That is not necessarily a criticism of the Commission, but we assessed that its aspiration that the strategy would be a fundamental tool for debate would not be realised, because of its general nature and because it may have come too early.

It is worth noting that holding such debates on an Adjournment motion on a Thursday, when there is no pressing business in the House, means that we do not necessarily engage all those hon. Members who would normally want to be engaged in the process, because constituency priorities take many of them out of the House.

This will obviously be an important year for the EU. It will have to face up to not only a ratified Lisbon treaty, we hope, and all the new arrangements contained therein, but a new Parliament. There will have been parliamentary elections by the time the annual policy strategy becomes a work programme. That will change the environment in which the debate will continue. Then a new Commission will be appointed, which may set new priorities that disrupt the aspirations in the document.

On behalf of the Committee, I should like to outline what we saw as the key proposals in the annual policy strategy document that people might want to take on board. The Lisbon strategy for growth and jobs will continue to be at the heart of the Commission's political agenda; I hope that that will be applauded by everyone, because it is fundamental to where we are going as a European partnership. The Commission says:

"The impact of the global financial turbulence on the real economy and the hike in raw material prices will require the EU to deepen its structural reforms at both EU and national level."

That is something that we should welcome; just as we are not isolated from the world, the EU is not isolated from the world, and just as we can defend our own position financially, so the EU can help us to defend the position of the 500 million people in the EU.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am interested in what my hon. Friend is saying; I always listen with care to what he says on these matters. He is talking about deepening "structural reforms" in the European Union. Those are typical EU words; I wonder whether he could say a little more about precisely what they mean.

Michael Connarty: Indeed I can. Although this is a very deep and important subject, the Commission sums it up by saying:

"Removing unnecessary administrative burdens put on businesses will be forcefully pursued."

If anyone has gone to engage in debate with the other members of the European Union, they will know that, as a country, we have taken on board the Lisbon agenda very strongly. We have gone for liberated markets, including in labour. Some would say that that flexibility has helped to generate jobs, so that we have more people in employment in the UK than we have ever had on record.

Unfortunately, we see a growth in the EU of what has become known as economic patriotism; it used to be called protectionism. Even as we have signed up early to some directives, so other countries are now pushing them back. The one that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) hears me talk about quite a lot is the postal directive. We have liberated our postal markets, but the date for the liberalisation of the whole postal market in Europe, which should have been 2009, has now been pushed back to 2011, with some countries calling for a derogation until 2013. Therefore, access to the postal markets will not be available to UK firms in the way that it is available to firms from other parts of the EU.

There are many other examples of such delay. The unbundling of energy markets, with the idea of breaking up the generators of energy from the people who distribute and sell energy, is something that we have already done, but the idea has not been warmly welcomed, let us say, by other countries.

I will not go into great detail about it, but I received an excellent document from the City of London corporation called, "Delivering a competitive EU single market for the 21st century". It is very well drafted and contains many ideas that we will hopefully take up as a UK Government; perhaps it will be quoted at length as a source of inspiration for Opposition Members. It outlines a very important way of thinking about the future. If there is a new European Commission and a new European Parliament, I hope that they will be more in favour of the Lisbon agenda and less opposed to it; unfortunately, opposition to the Lisbon agenda has been signalled by some at the moment.

The other measures being emphasised are the EU cohesion programmes. To quote the Commission in the annual policy strategy document, those programmes will "ensure a major source of investment at regional level to implement the Lisbon strategy. European social partners' contribution to the Lisbon agenda will also be geared up... The Commission wishes to focus on activities in the area of support for Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs), building in particular on the forthcoming European Small Business Act... The European Institute for Innovation and Technology"— will enter—

"its first full year of operation... A key follow-up to the 2007 Single Market Review will be an initiative on shared partnerships between the Commission and Member States to apply and enforce Single Market law, clarifying the respective roles of the Commission and Member States and their shared responsibilities in making the Single Market work."

As we all know, 2009 will be an important year to take forward work on energy and climate change. We had a debate last week on the proposal for renewable energy. Our position as a Government is to look for more flexibility in the mandatory targets that have been set by the EU. For example, the Minister for Energy has said that it will cost £5 billion per annum to reach the target of 15 per cent. renewables by 2020. In this particular economic climate, that figure must be a cause for concern. I therefore hope that the figure will be negotiable when the annual strategy policy document turns into the work programme.

Bringing the energy and climate change package to the implementation phase will be a priority. The package will include implementing the revised emissions trading scheme; enacting new legislation on renewables, as I have mentioned; and putting into effect energy efficiency action plans and developing low-carbon technologies. I hope that we all aspire to seeing those measures implemented. At this early stage in the annual policy strategy document, I hope that hon. Members will engage with the implementation process through Select Committees and their own special interests.

The Commission states that a key priority will be to make a success of the Galileo project, which will now be managed by the Commission. There was great controversy, and as a Committee we joined in with that controversy. We were not necessarily convinced that Galileo, as it was originally structured, would be capable of functioning as a commercial activity, and so it turned out; it has now been taken on by the Commission, with some regret on some parts and with some welcome on other parts. Our late colleague, Gwyneth Dunwoody, was very resistant to the idea that the Commission should take on the Galileo project. A number of Opposition Members argued that we have the global positioning system from the USA, which was free to use, and therefore that we did not need a European system. However, we have Galileo, and now we must deal with the question of Galileo, under what is called the Galileo Commission project.

There will also be work on the green transport package. There is a great deal of controversy about how green transport is achieved. In the European Parliament recently, a motion was carried that rejected the idea of biofuels being part of the package, because of the current effect of biofuels on food and food prices.

The APS also mentions the common immigration policy, which will remain a fundamental priority for the Commission and a number of key actions in that field are envisaged. Among others, those actions include the adoption of proposals on legal migration; the further development of Frontex; and work towards completion of the common European asylum system. Of course, the UK has a choice of opting into or out of all those actions, and that will prompt debate in the House every time these issues come up for discussion.

Mr. Hollobone: I am listening with interest to what the hon. Gentleman is saying, and he has now come on to the important issue of immigration. Of course, the EU has some extremely long land and sea borders. Does he or his Committee have any real confidence that the European Commission will introduce any effective measures to prevent the growth of large-scale illegal immigration into the EU?

Michael Connarty: In fact, the role of the European Scrutiny Committee is not to discuss and make policy on the merits of an idea, but to ensure that the Government puts forward all the information necessary for Parliament, either in a debate that we hold on the Floor of the House or in the correspondence that we have with the Minister in relation to what the Government propose at the Council of Ministers, which is then reported in the form of statements to the House. Those statements are then on the record in Hansard and in the Library, and every Member should obviously engage with that process of debate if they are interested in the issues.

Personally, I must say that there was a lot of strong argument that we should have joined the Schengen arrangements immediately. There were many reasons against doing so politically, but I can see very few reasons against engaging in all of the processes on immigration and asylum that are proposed under the treaty of Amsterdam. It is unfortunate that the political arguments basically scared everybody into thinking that, if we lost our own borders, we would have a flood of immigrants; we did not lose our own borders and then we had a flood of immigrants anyway.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): The fundamental point is that no country will surrender control over its immigration policy to Brussels. So when the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) makes that appeal, he has to convert his own party into thinking in a more pro-European way. Immigration and the control of borders is a matter of national sovereignty; I might regret that, but that is the reality. He cannot wish the European Commission to be tougher on immigration, but deny it the powers and the right to act tougher.

Michael Connarty: That point is very well made. As a former Minister for Europe, my right hon. Friend knows this territory very well. In fact, he was probably the Minister for Europe when some of these decisions were made in the early days.

Immigration is an important matter; it is in the annual policy strategy document, and it will obviously work into the work programme. It is not an issue that will go away; it has to be worked on, and we have to engage step by step with that process. With many of these matters, if the Lisbon treaty is ratified, we will have to take opt-in decisions on them, and as a Committee we are considering how they will be dealt with by Parliament, because Parliament must have a say in advising Ministers about whether or not they should opt in on each of these individual matters.

The point about the 2007 inquiry that we undertook relating to this subject is that it is not likely to cause the kind of engagement on the annual policy strategy document that would prompt the debates on detail. Such issues will come within the work programme; but by highlighting some of them today, we hope that members of the Select Committees will look at the annual policy strategy document. The Government are very positive about it. I have not heard anything from them to indicate that there is something in it that frightens them. It contains matters that we know they are now moving through the process.

We will send the annual policy strategy document and our report on it to all the Select Committees, and I hope that Members will engage with it. Others who do not serve on Select Committees might want to look at the document to see which items are covered, as the hon. Member for Kettering did, whether it is the audit function, or immigration and asylum, the use of Frontex and the building of stronger Schengen arrangements to protect our borders.

[Michael Connarty]

Those are all things that I hope will be attractive to Members of Parliament who think, as I do, that we need to engage much more closely with Europe. Europe post-Lisbon will involve more of a resolution of forces and less of a triangle of Commission, Council and national Parliaments. The European Parliament will get much more power. We must find a way to be one of the forces in it that makes good policy for Europe, and one of the ways to do so is to engage early, which the annual policy strategy document gives us a chance to do.

I will have to leave early, Mr. Bayley, because I have to speak about the European Union to a group of business people for the Industry and Parliament Trust at 3 o'clock, so I apologise that I will not be here for the rest of the debate.

2.51 pm

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): I welcome the Government's finding time for this debate, although, like my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty), I regret the fact that only three Labour Back Benchers—my hon. Friend is here in his capacity as the distinguished Chairman of the European Scrutiny Committee—one distinguished Conservative Back Bencher and three Front-Bench spokespersons are here. That puts into perspective the gap between some of the hysteria about Europe that we read in the anti-European right-wing press and the actual state of public debate on and awareness of Europe.

In a sense, there is some reality in that position, because, at the end of the day, the European Commission takes just 1 per cent. of Europe's gross national income for its purposes, and, of that 1 per cent., about 85 per cent. is immediately returned to national Governments in the form principally of agricultural payments and what are called structural, regional or cohesion funds. The agricultural policy is much contested in Britain, and rightly so. But if we did not have the CAP—the common agricultural policy—we would have to have a BAP, FAP and GAP; that is, a British, a French and a German agricultural policy. That is enough acronyms.

Believe me, I am absolutely confident that the National Farmers Union, backed by redoubtable Conservative Members of Parliament from the rural areas, would be extracting even greater subsidies for the farming industry in this country from the British national taxpayer than what is provided through the CAP.

Kelvin Hopkins: I think the idea of national agricultural policies has great appeal. Does my right hon. Friend not agree that national Governments would be much better than the European Union at targeting subsidies where and when they are necessary, and that the agricultural situation and industry of each member state is quite different from that of all the other member states? It would be much more sensible for national Governments, not the European Union, to determine agricultural policies.

Mr. MacShane: Having lived in Switzerland and seen the massive subsidies—a much greater share of state revenue than in this country—that the Swiss taxpayer has to give to its farmers because they are not in the CAP, I am not entirely convinced by my hon. Friend's argument. Furthermore, to make an agricultural policy stick is a matter not just of subsidy but of import and export of agricultural goods, and the ineluctable and natural tendency of any farming lobby since the far-off days of the Roman empire is to ensure the protection of borders. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) smiles at that reference to ancient history, but Socrates, who predated the Roman empire, said that the man who does not know the price of a bushel of wheat will not last long in politics. If Socrates were an adviser to the NFU today, he would find that that aphorism still applies.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us the price of a bushel of wheat?

Mr. MacShane: That is precisely why I am not a very successful politician. I did not study long and hard enough at the school of Socrates.

Of the 1 per cent. that comes to Europe, 85 per cent. goes straight back to national Governments for disbursement, and it is at national Government level that the legendary and perfectly accurate point about not being able to sign off accounts occurs. The European Commission is not able to have a functionary and accountant in every sheep field and wheat field to count the lambs and bushels in and out. The task is clearly beyond anybody's grasp.

It is actually the failure of national Governments to spend the money in an accountable way that means that the European Commission cannot sign off its accounts, just as we cannot sign off—and never have been able to under any Administration—the accounts of the Department for Work and Pensions in any of its previous manifestations. I am afraid that the level of benefit fraud in Britain is such that an accountant cannot sign off the accounts. He knows that money has gone out but he cannot be sure how it has been spent.

We have to bear down and demand maximum transparency, but when we examine Europe, we find that 1 per cent. of its gross national income goes to Brussels, and of that 1 per cent., 85 per cent. is sent back for disbursement through national Governments. Just 15 per cent. of 1 per cent. is all that remains to the Commission—one seventh of 1 per cent. The idea that one can construct a monolithic superstate steamroller that destroys national freedoms and liberties in its path on the basis of one seventh of 1 per cent. of collective state income is nonsense. What is remarkable is how much has been achieved with that rather small portion of total EU income.

I will not enumerate the advantages that we have through travel, trade, investment and so on, because I want to focus on two narrow areas of the annual policy strategy for 2009. I hope that before I leave this House we might have a Government debate, in Government time, on something called the Government's annual policy strategy for the year. That would be an exciting and innovative concept, but I am not sure that it would completely commend itself to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister or any future Prime Minister who may occupy 10 Downing street.

I had the pleasure of observing the Macedonian elections two Sundays ago. Some of them will be rerun this Sunday because of electoral fraud and manipulation. Before that, I had the pleasure of being in Kosovo, which I visited often as a Minister. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister will be in Kosovo on Sunday or Monday, at the moment when Kosovo achieves its statehood. It has already made its declaration of independence, but this weekend, and with the presence of the Minister, it will celebrate its independence. It is absolutely right that Britain should be there because the fate of the western Balkans has taken up a great deal of the attention of the House and the Government over the past 20 years.

I suspect that all of us in this House will, at some stage, have had gentlemen and women come into our surgeries who are asylum seekers from Kosovo or other parts of the western Balkans, or who have been transited through that broad region from Athens up to the Alps. Trying to bring some stability, democracy and rule of law to that region ought to be a Government priority. It took far too long for the British Government to intervene in the 1990s.

I commend to those who are interested the statement made to the House by the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind), who was Foreign Secretary at the time of the Srebrenica massacre. I saw a bowl of water on the Dispatch Box and a distinguished Foreign Secretary washing his hands in it, saying, "It's nothing to do with me, we cannot do anything, we're staying out of it." I hope that I never have the shame of listening to that kind of do-nothing policy again in my lifetime. Later, we had to intervene in Kosovo. It is one of the positive marks in the record of the former Prime Minister, Tony Blair, that he put together the coalition and persuaded the United States to put in air and land power to stop the mass butchery of Muslims by Milosevic's thugs.

For nine years, soldiers have been down there—18,000 are currently in the Kosovo peace implementation force—and Kosovo has been in limbo, being neither a state nor a province. It is quite clear that the people of Kosovo utterly reject rule by Belgrade, just as the people of Slovenia, Croatia and Macedonia and, more latterly, the people of Montenegro rejected its rule. The people of Kosovo did that peacefully by building their own civil society in the 1980s and 1990s, under a great leader, President Ibrahim Rugova. They took the path of Ghandian non-violence until the very last moments of 1998 and 1999, when such were the exactions and repressions by the Black and Tans of the Milosevic militia that a resistance army was formed and a short war took place until the intervention of NATO, Europe, the United States and the United Nations to bring peace to the area. However, peace in the sense of absence of war has not meant peace in the sense of the Kosovans being allowed to create their own Government, elect their own leaders, decide their own laws and build their own relationships with their neighbours and the wider world.

Martti Ahtisaari, the Finnish President, after many long visits to both Belgrade and Pristina, and after the utter refusal of the authorities in Belgrade to accept that Kosovo should be Kosovo, advanced a plan, which in his typical Ahtisaari, Finnish way contained important safeguards for the Serb people in Kosovo. There is no denying that Kosovo is, for many Serbs, part of their historic roots: the first patriarchy of Serbia was in Pec, which is in Kosovo, and some of the great battles in Serbian history were fought in what is now Kosovo. However, one could say the same about Ireland in relation to England in the 1920s. Looking back to the 14th century, I imagine that bits of France were then part of England, but we do not seriously expect to be allowed to reclaim them. It is one of the tragedies of the western Balkans that the Serbs have not allowed Kosovo to be Kosovo and accepted that the future will be different; instead, they have been locked, sadly, in the past—particularly the ultra-nationalist irredentists in Belgrade, who have been making speeches and demanding that the Kosovans should accept rule by Belgrade again.

Kelvin Hopkins: There has been a suggestion of partition for some small bits of Kosovo, which would allow the remaining small groups of Serbs who tend to be on the Serbian fringes of Kosovo to join Serbia or form enclaves within Kosovo. Is that possible?

Mr. MacShane: I travelled from Prizren to Kacanik in the southern part of Kosovo and went through Brezovica, which is a Serb enclave—it is the principal ski station in Kosovo—doing a little reconnaissance for a later visit. As former chair of the all-party group on skiing, I say that it is important that we build our contacts on the slopes. The notion that this little part of Kosovo could somehow be disconnected and reconnected to Serbia is a bit like saying that Luton could be disconnected from Bedfordshire and reconnected to one of the many European countries that my hon. Friend is so fond of.

Kelvin Hopkins: Wales.

Mr. MacShane: Perhaps. The answer to my hon. Friend's question is no; the frontiers are set. Many Albanians living in the Presevo valley in Serbia proper could also make that claim. It is better to stick with the current frontiers rather than start trying to redraw them, which is not a Serb demand, by the way; the Serb demand is still that Kosovo is an eternal part of Serbia and that the Kosovans just jolly well have to live with that. On the contrary, we have to lend maximum support to allow Kosovo to be Kosovo. Britain has done that. Some 42 nations have now recognised Kosovo, and that is the agreed position of the European Union.

However, I say with regret that key European partners are refusing to recognise Kosovo. Spain, for example, does not recognise Kosovo, for reasons that are astonishing. As someone who has always supported Spanish freedoms and democracy, I have to say that for Spain to side with the Serbs is the same as if I were to side with the ETA thugs in the Basque country against the broader interests of the Spanish people. Bulgaria, a Slav country, has recognised Kosovo and I congratulate it for doing so. However, Romania, which is not a Slav country has, for whatever reasons, refused so to do.

Greece does not recognise Kosovo. That is a contradiction in terms of Greeks' national interests. Greece needs a peaceful western Balkans corridor soon—I should like it to be composed of EU member states—through which Greek commercial interests, including tourism, can pass, allowing visitors to go peacefully up to the north of Europe instead of having to go through all the border checks. There is huge Greek investment in both Macedonia and Kosovo. Greek business men are there, helpfully making money and growing the two economies. Yet Athens cannot, for its own reasons, find its way to a peaceful relationship with Macedonia over the name issue or even give Kosovo diplomatic recognition, as we have and as France, Germany, the Nordic countries and the United States have.

[Mr. MacShane]

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to get the Foreign Office to see what it can do to counter the Spanish diplomatic campaign in Latin America against recognition for Kosovo. Through the Commonwealth and with our French friends—through La Francophonie, as it is called—and through other networks of states, working in particular with the majority Muslim countries, I ask him to see what can be done to show Belgrade and, behind Belgrade, a deeply revanchiste Russia, that Kosovo is getting recognition.

I am impressed by the level of economic activity in Kosovo. In the three or four years since I last visited, when I was a Minister, it really has been transformed from a war-torn country into one with a great deal of economic activity. Much of the money in the country is what we call "black money", or illegal money, but as the Swiss say, money has no smell. With new buildings being built, along with new restaurants, hotels and gas stations, and with cars on the road—there are traffic jams galore in Pristina—and motorways being built, I see a future of economic activity and buzz.

Thank goodness, the 2nd Battalion the Rifles is currently in Kosovo, but only for a short time to cover the arrival of the EU legislative team, which is mentioned on page 6 of the report. The Ministry of Defence suffers from immense overstretch and from the deep irritation, shared by many hon. Members, at the fact that although there are 18,000 troops in Kosovo, few of them are as capable of imposing peace as the British Army and one or two other European contingents. I ask the MOD to see whether there are training possibilities in Kosovo for the soldiers we have stationed in Germany, and some way of having more British soldiers on the ground. Believe me, armoured vehicles going around with the Union Jack fluttering at the back do more to send out signals of confidence, law and order and a rule-based society than almost anything else.

We need to de-UNMIK Kosovo—the United Nations Mission in Kosovo—which is mandated by the UN and does its best. However, after the initial year or two with top people visiting, it does not have the finest flowers of the available global civil service. I am sure that they do not leave security material on the local public transport, but they are not necessarily of the highest quality. Frankly, a state cannot be run by the United Nations. A nation can only run itself by creating its own state.

Macedonia, which is next door to Kosovo, has never gone over the edge into full-scale violence, as the ex-Yugoslav states to its northern frontier did in the 1990s. In 2001, we came close, but strong intervention by Lord Robertson, who was the Secretary-General of NATO, Lord Patten, who was the EU Commissioner for foreign affairs, and Javier Solana, who was the European Council's representative on foreign matters, really made a difference. Through the Lake Ohrid agreement, they stabilised the situation and avoided what could otherwise have been a quite difficult confrontation between Macedonians and Albanians, and between Macedonians and Macedonians of a more Slavic origin.

Unfortunately, the failure of the EU and NATO to allow Macedonia to pursue full Euro-Atlantic integration has led to the return of some of the old political thinking in Macedonia. I do not blame Her Majesty's Government for that in any way. We have two excellent ambassadors in Andrew Key, who is in Skopje, and Andy Sparks, who is in Pristina. I also know how concerned the Minister is about the issue and how concerned previous Europe Ministers have been about it in the past few years. However, the plain fact is that Macedonia was led to believe that it could join NATO, when key NATO stakeholders did not have enough authority to overturn Greek objections.

I will not enter into the debate about Macedonia's name—it is rather like the argument in "Gulliver's Travels" about whether one should crack an egg at the big end or the small end. I accept that the issue is of passionate importance to our Greek friends, but it should not prevent Macedonia from exercising its right to pursue EU and NATO integration. I therefore ask the Minister to see what solutions can be found. We should leave the issue of the name to one side, and I will not, as I said, enter into a debate about its merits or demerits. We should not allow the question whether a rose is a rose by any other name, or Macedonia is Macedonia by any other name, to block Macedonia's path to greater EU integration.

The same is true for Serbia. I love the Serb people. On every visit to Belgrade, I feel that I am in one of the greatest cities of the world, with an educated, cultivated, post-industrial—almost post-national—class of people who are multilingual and hugely talented. None the less, they seem to want to live firmly in the past. We make a mistake in thinking that if we are kind to the Serbs, they will be kind to themselves.

In that respect, I regret that there was a change of policy at the European Council on the issue of Ratko Mladic, the man primarily responsible for the butchery of 8,000 European Muslims in cold blood in 1995. The condition that was always set—that he should go to The Hague if Serbia is to unlock the door barring it from setting out on the path to future EU membership—seems to have been watered down. Ratko Mladic is known to the Serb authorities and he was part of the Serb army and militia network. He was seen around Belgrade a few years ago, so he is not hiding in the hills, unlike his comrade in shame, Karadzic, who is in Republic Srpska. We should have made Mladic's removal to The Hague an unqualified condition, just as we made the rendering of Ante Gotovina to The Hague a condition for starting Croatia's application for EU membership.

The Serbs do not respect the EU when it gets weaker bit by bit, drops conditionality and thinks that it will be rewarded for being nice. Not until we politically confront and defeat the so-called radicals—they are actually ugly, Falangist nationalists, who are not radical in any progressive or decent sense of the word—will there be much hope for Serbia and its brave President, Boris Tadic.

Those are just some views on the western Balkans, which derive from my complete belief that, having offered to integrate the western Balkans into Europe and Euro-Atlantic structures, we have taken our eye off the ball. For honourable and decent reasons, the eyes of the Minister and the Foreign Secretary have to be on many other balls and many other parts of the world. Currently, they are probably on the level of rainfall in Ireland and on what effect that might have on a certain decision that is being taken in the emerald isle today. However, Europe and Her Majesty's Government have not put the same high-level pressure on the western Balkans that they did during the recent great crises. Bit by bit, the Balkans, instead of Europeanising, are gently suggesting that they might balkanise Europe. We need a serious push to move all the western Balkan nations—I have not gone into depth about Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro or Croatia—into the same position that Slovenia now finds itself in.

I turn now to the section of this excellent document entitled "Europe as a World Partner" and to the issue of the Maghreb—the countries of Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria. There is a debate about the extent to which Libya should be considered a fully Maghrebian country, but for the sake of my remarks, I will refer just to Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia. Those three countries are indispensable future partners for Europe, and I therefore very much welcome the initiative by President Sarkozy. When he announced what the French would do during their presidency of the EU, he said that they would create what he called a union for the Mediterranean.

That raised certain eyebrows and met with opposition from parts of the EU that felt that the proposals were about the French seeking to put themselves in the driving seat in relation to their corner of Europe—the western Mediterranean. It was thought that that would somehow undo the so-called Barcelona process and the Euromed work launched in 1995. Be that as it may, new energy and a new initiative were needed to get Mediterranean and European economic and diplomatic relationships going again. Of course, the supreme prize is peace in the middle east, but rather than trying to climb the Mount Everest of middle east peace without oxygen, it might be better to attempt the rather lower mountains of the Maghreb countries. I hope that the Government will support President Sarkozy, and I am sure that they will be represented at the conference that he proposes to call. I also hope that we will somewhat upgrade our economic, political and diplomatic relations with the countries in the area.

The three Maghreb countries are all tricky. Algeria is an enormous potential source of energy—particularly gas—for the EU, but since the early 1990s it has faced a non-stop assault by ideological Islamists, which is aimed at destabilising the state. In that respect, it remains a mark of shame that Britain—its legal system, the Home Office, Liberty and all the other libertarian organisations—protected a man called Rachid Ramda, who was the financier behind the Algerian Islamist onslaught on the Paris Metro, which killed several innocent people in 1995. That was a forerunner of what happened in Madrid and in our own London tube bombings in July 2005. It took 10 years for this terrorist thug to be sent back to face his accusers in Paris and he is now, correctly, serving a life sentence because the evidence—with or without 42 days' discussion with him—was incontrovertible.

That is what the Algerian state has faced. It is a nationalist state run by the military, so it is not my cup of tea in human rights terms. However, we should encourage it to take the same path as other parts of the world, such as Taiwan and Korea, as well as some of the Latin American and south-east Asian states, which started off in an authoritarian way but evolved over time.

Morocco has functioning political parties. It has a young king, who is trying to maintain order without wanting to lose the control and authority that all kings have before they understand the benefits of a parliamentary system. He works closely with the Jewish community in the country, just as the President of Tunisia does with the Jewish community there. Morocco's king is seeking a different relationship with Europe. Sadly, there are not enough British contacts down there. We see the Maghreb countries as being a bit of a French backyard. The Spanish and the French have significant disagreements about Western Sahara and the Sahel. There is not, for example, any trade between Morocco and Algeria, which is as absurd as having no trade between Germany and France.

We should be taking the argument for what we have achieved in Europe in the past 40 years and saying that it would be a way forward, although we must be careful not to patronise. Of course we should make demands for freedom of expression and human rights, but it is a huge pleasure to walk around in Tunis, for example, and see Tunisian women not being obliged by a patriarchal religious order to wear strange costumes covering them, and to be normal women who hold down Government, ministerial and professional jobs.

President Sarkozy's initiative faces difficulties such as whether Muslim Government leaders will be prepared to sit down in the same room with the Prime Minister of Israel, and the question of Turkey.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend alluded to Western Sahara, in which I take a particular interest. Surely the French could do more to persuade Morocco that its performance over Western Sahara, in direct contravention of all UN mandates, is disgraceful. It is about time that we recognised that. The British have a much more progressive attitude towards Western Sahara—that it is a country in all but name and should be treated as such.

Mr. MacShane: The UN has commissions in the region, and the very distinguished Baker Commission is working on the issue. I am very glad, at times, that we did not have debates of this kind when the American South chose to secede from the Union in 1861. Such issues of identity are sensitive and difficult. In 1987, the Labour party election manifesto contained more about Polisario than it did about Europe. When people go on visits and meet dear friends from different movements around the world, they can get very focused on those issues. We need an agreement and peace, but Algeria also needs to stop supporting people whom the Moroccan Government see as being against them. All three of those Governments need the maximum support to stop what is now called the Maghreb branch of al-Qaeda. Whether that name is self-taken, or really represents any intervention by al-Qaeda, I am not qualified to judge; but we need more intervention, visits, investment, trade and commerce. Those three majority Muslim nations—not quite Arab, because the people are Berber—are future big partners for Europe.

[Mr. MacShane]

As I said, France also must understand its responsibility to Turkey, and face down the right-wing Islamophobe dislike of Turkey from many Conservative parties in Europe. Conservative parties in Europe tend to treat Turkey in the way our Conservative party treats the European Union—they dislike and oppose it, and wish to have as little as possible to do with it.

I will finish on a political point. The Minister and his colleagues who work for British national interests in Europe will be able to work so much more effectively and efficiently if the main Opposition party becomes realistic and sensible about Europe, because it may one day form the Government of the country, although after the comic opera that has been announced to our delight and delectation this afternoon, that day may be much further off than its members imagined before about 1.30 pm. The better-off-out brigade need to be put in their box, just as, in the early 1990s, Labour had to put in their box all the anti-Europeans who were keeping it in permanent opposition. I want to see a day when the entire British elected parliamentary and political class—with the noble exceptions of dear friends whose scepticism I respect, love and admire—will know that to have any voice in Europe, we need to be networking and broadly supportive of it. If we want to change the CAP we must change the point of view of our Irish friends—not our French friends. It is Ireland that refuses all reform of the CAP. To have an effective European defence and security strategy it is necessary to persuade the French to back President Sarkozy in his apparent aim of reintegrating France into NATO—and so on.

I wish the Minister well in what will be tricky and interesting negotiations in the coming period. Whether or not the treaty is ratified, we shall need to get our policies in place to bring about economic growth, social justice, rights for workers and a common policy on the environment, and to find some way of speaking as one with the incoming American President. At the moment, on Russia, on Kosovo, as I suggested, on energy questions and on too many other issues, Europe comes up with the lowest common denominator policy, and does not speak as one or provide an effective partner to the United States and the other great democracies of the world.

3.25 pm

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): It is a pleasure to speak in this debate, and having called frequently for such European debates, I could do little else but speak. I want to speak also because it is important that the left critical view of the European Union should be heard. It is the view of a substantial body of people outside Parliament and in the Labour movement in particular. The TUC, for example, has opposed the Lisbon treaty and supported a referendum on it. There are many other active members of our party and movement who feel strongly that the European Union is not the democratic socialist ideal that we should want it to become if it continues.

We have recently had the problem of a European Court of Justice ruling in favour of employers against employees, which seemed to go against the fundamental right to strike, which the European Union has enshrined. Many of us are worried that that augurs a possible change of direction, whereby more and more power will be ceded to employers, with a progressive reduction in the influence and power of working people and their organisations.

Mr. MacShane: Does my hon. Friend agree that the principal cases that he refers to in Sweden, Germany and Finland all concern the absence of a statutory minimum wage in those countries? The European Court of Justice cannot overturn national law on minimum wages. That is the big problem. Those countries, for honourable reasons, do not have a legal minimum wage, which would allow the European Court of Justice a way to debate employment rights there. That is why I believe that we should support a European minimum wage across Europe, set at a strong level, to support the working class everywhere in Europe.

Kelvin Hopkins: That might be a long-term approach, but in the short term the decision went in favour of employers, not employees. However, that is just an aside. I wanted to talk in general about several economic aspects of the European Union.

Like a number of people in the Labour party, both inside and outside Parliament, I oppose the Lisbon treaty. I did not just support a referendum, but I would have voted no. It is interesting that Ireland, which has been referred to, is holding a referendum today, and there is a possibility of a no vote, which would save us an awful lot of trouble. I hope that there will be a no vote. I should welcome that and cheer it. I should probably have a glass of good French champagne to celebrate. The skies would not fall in; we would have the status quo, which is far too integrated even now.

I am one of those people who would have liked, as I have said many times here and in the main Chamber, a referendum on the Single European Act and on the Maastricht treaty. Those fairly fundamental changes were the change of direction—the real speeding up of the process of integration towards what I believe is a state of Europe, or a country of Europe, which will eventually completely marginalise the elected nation state Governments and Parliaments.

Mr. Drew: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Does he find it surprising that, as far as I can see from all the material that has come from the EU, there is no plan B? If the Irish were to reject the constitution today, one would have thought that a set of proposals would be put in place immediately to say, "We don't want a constitution". However, there does not seem to be anything. That is the nature of the relentless drive towards centralisation and federalism. That is what some of us are so alarmed about.

Kelvin Hopkins: I agree with my hon. Friend. My plan B would be to retain the strength of the democratic Parliaments of the member states and get them to work co-operatively for mutual benefit. Democratic power would have to be retained at the nation-state level. In other words, they would co-operate when necessary and when mutually agreed for mutual benefit, but they would not be compelled to do so or to cede power to the centre of Europe and have our nation-state Parliaments overridden by the European Union. That is my position.

I speak—as I have many times—as a European. Everything about me shrieks Europe. I am a European by ancestry. The language that I speak and the ones that I try to speak are European. My enthusiasm for the arts, my love of geography and everything else are related to Europe. The European Union is a political imposition on Europe; it is not Europe. I resent the use of the word "Europe" for the European Union. Europe covers countries as far afield as Russia—as far as the Urals—Norway, Switzerland and wherever. It is bigger than the European Union, and the European Union is a political construct of which we must be wary.

As I say, if there is a no vote, we will go back to the status quo, and things will not be very different from now. However, they will be significantly different if the vote is carried.

I was talking to some visiting French business men in a Committee room last week. They were from the nuclear industry and were fairly conservative people. When I talked about the economy, they were shocked at my views. It was almost as though economics did not count in Europe and the union was a political concept or idea. I said that, if it was such a political idea, why was the European Union so concerned to exercise economic control, to construct the single European currency and to have a European Central Bank that sets interest rates independently of any democratic control? I said that it was about economics and that economics is driven not by the interests of working people, but by the interests of big business and global corporations. I think that I made my point, but they were rather shocked that I emphasised economics.

We are possibly on the verge of very serious economic times. The credit crunch, the sub-prime lending crisis and rising oil and food prices are leading us towards a great hole in consumer and economic demand that could cause a recession of quite serious dimensions. We in Britain are more exposed than the continent of Europe. Nevertheless, all of us will be affected by some kind of economic downturn. It was just at these times that Keynes and others—Keynes was the greatest of them—said that Governments should borrow and spend to counter recessionary forces. Yet, at the moment, we are being told by the European Union that we must not borrow; we must not let our debt get out of hand. Debt in Britain is not excessive compared with some other countries and with what we have had in the past. If we are going into a serious recession, we should expect to borrow. I do not think that we want the European Union telling us, "You have to tighten your belt and spend less." That would drive us deeper into recession, and we do not want that. We want to spend more to counter recessionary forces.

If there is a problem with debt, the logical way to deal with that is to raise taxes, but not tax the people who spend money, but the people who have lots of money. Those with an elementary knowledge of economics understand that, if we tax very rich people who tend to keep their money in banks, it will not have much of a deflationary impact on the economy, but if we tax poor people, it will. It is economically beneficial to redistribute income from the rich to the poor in difficult economic times. Poor people, by the very nature of their lives, spend every penny that they get on surviving. Therefore, they keep demand going. Rich people, even possibly the better-off Members of Parliament, will not be too affected by an increase in taxes. My suggestion for increasing taxes in Britain does not reach down as far as the incomes of Back Benchers—possibly Ministers, but not Back Benchers. I will have to check that out.

I have dealt with fiscal policy, borrowing, debt and public expenditure, and the other area is interest rates. The European Union is still dominated by deflationist monetarists who control the European Central Bank. They are talking about keeping interest rates high to squeeze out inflation. When an economy goes into serious recession, inflation is not the problem. The problem is generating demand to survive. Inflation will automatically come down if we go into a serious recession; prices will fall.

If we try to counter inflation, even in relatively stable economic times, we have to see from where the inflation comes. For example, it could be generated by external forces, such as the price of oil. In that instance, if we force an economy into recession to squeeze out inflation, we would destroy the internal economy to deal with something that is beyond our control—the price of oil. Inflation is not the serious threat that faces Europe at the moment; it is recession. At a point—it may be a high point—the price of oil will level off. It may be $200 a barrel, but it will level off. It is then that the additional inflation eases off.

Provided that the internal economies are kept strong and that sufficient product is coming through, inflation will not be a serious problem internally. If, however, by deflating the economy like mad, we destroy the internal economy, when we come to reflate, there will not be enough productive capacity to meet demand. That is when we would get inflation again, and it would be demand-driven inflation rather than cost-driven inflation.

I do not want to give a lecture on economics, but the European Union and our Government should be worrying about recession and not inflation. I hope that the European Union will think again. Even now in Britain, we are considering whether or not to raise interest rates. I must admit that I went hairless the other day—as hon. Members can well see—at the thought that we might have three more interest rate rises in the pipeline from the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England. I do not think that that will happen. Within a few weeks or months, the economy would be in such difficulty that we would not be raising interest rates; we would be lowering them, which is what I suggested in Treasury questions last week.

There are other aspects to the annual policy strategy report. My right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane), who is not in his seat at the moment, talked as though the budget was the major problem. It is not the major problem, but it is something that we must address and something that is ill-designed and unfair to Britain. I have suggested how it should be seriously reformed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty) is Chair of the European Scrutiny Committee, of which I am happy to be a member. He suggested that we should be more proactive in policy. I agree with him, and I have been proactive. I have probably spoken at 80 or 90 European Standing Committee sittings over the past 11 years. My hon. Friend the Minister for Europe was the Whip on those Committees. I remember him urging me not to speak too long, so that everyone could go home early. I did have my say, and I made my point.

[Kelvin Hopkins]

One of the points that I repeatedly made was that, if we must have a European budget that has receipts and disbursements, it should be related to the relative prosperity of the member states, so that the rich ones are net contributors and the poor ones are net recipients, and it is all done on a fair basis. The common agricultural policy completely distorts that. If we took the CAP out of the equation and repatriated it to member states, the distortions in the budget would disappear. We could have a budget that was broadly related to the relative prosperity of different nations. There would be a redistribution of income between member states. The amounts concerned would be modest—perhaps 0.5 per cent. of gross domestic product or something—but the process would work well and those concerned would be happy with it. It is foolish, misguided and ill-designed for the whole budget process to be distorted by the CAP. Some countries are big net contributors when they should not be, and others are big net recipients when they should not be.

Mr. Drew: Bizarrely, at a time when we need to subsidise agricultural prices and look again at the traditional British system of deficiency payments, yet again the EU is continuing to argue for a minimum price system that is totally anti-poor. The system will lead to the production of the wrong products and will do nothing for international understanding at this difficult time. I am sure my hon. Friend would agree with that.

Kelvin Hopkins: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have made the point in the past that price maintenance policies are always misguided. The European Union is supposed to be about free markets, yet it rigs the market in agricultural products completely. We must be careful about how we support and design our agricultural world, because we have a world-wide food problem that we must all address.

We should retain a significant amount of food production in our country for long-term strategic reasons, because we may all be facing serious problems in a few years. Each country ought to control its own agricultural policy. We should talk to other countries and try to adopt Fairtrade policies that do not damage poorer countries. Indeed, a well-argued letter from War on Want in The Independent this week pointed out that dumping cheap food on developing countries destroys local production. It also pointed out that farmers who in the past would have produced sufficient food for themselves—and possibly some surpluses—are now completely undermined by cheap food being exported by richer countries. That is an ongoing problem. My hon. Friend said that free markets in that sense do not work, and countries should be allowed, as he implied, to protect their agricultural sectors and ensure that they retain sufficient agricultural capacity at least to feed themselves.

I am going off the track of what I wanted to say. The point that I was about to make was about being proactive in relation to policy. I mentioned having a budget where receipts and contributions are related to relative prosperity between member states. I have said that many times and, interestingly, it was fed back into a European document of the type that we are considering. I read the document one day and there was a precise rejection of what I had been suggesting. I suppose that others might have also suggested the proposal, but it was interesting that it was rejected entirely. A good argument was not made against the proposal, except for saying that it would obviously mean the end of the CAP. The idea was said to be not practicable, or some such word.

Nevertheless, at least the proposal was noticed. If one has something to say, it is important in politics to say it over and again until it either proves to be incorrect or it has some effect and people start to take notice. We do not achieve very much by saying nothing. Just moaning about the European Union without being specific is not helpful, so I try to be fairly specific in these matters. The budget is ill-judged, ill-designed and ought to be fundamentally reformed, by abolishing the CAP and repatriating agricultural policies to member states.

I strongly support the greening of transport, which was mentioned in another part of the report. We are in an era of rapidly rising energy, and clearly the cost of transport—particularly personal transport—will rise rapidly. We will have to invest more in public transport. Certainly, in the continental countries, the time will come when travelling by train will be much cheaper than driving. Demand for rail travel will increase, because it will be the most economical and greenest way to travel.

Heavy investment in rail is important—in passenger and particularly freight services. Global warming and CO_2 emissions are serious issues. Compared with road freight, rail freight produces one twelfth of the volume of CO_2 per tonne mile—that is for heavy freight. Light freight is rather different, although even then there is a significant difference. For heavy freight, travelling by road is 12 times worse than by train. We must seriously invest in rail freight track capacity across the whole of Europe. That is being done on the continent of Europe, which is to the credit of our noble Friend Lord Kinnock, who promoted the idea of a cross-Europe rail freight network when he was Transport Commissioner.

Vast tunnels are being built through the Alps. Some of us visited the Brenner pass, which is a 35-mile tunnel primarily dedicated to freight. It is capable of taking double-stack containers on trains and will mean that trains carrying such containers can go from southern Italy to northern Germany. That is serious investment. We are miles behind in that respect. It is difficult even to get single-stack, full-size containers on to most of our network. If we want to be serious about being part of that network and that economic lifeblood or blood system of the European Union, we must build more rail freight capacity here.

My hon. Friend the Minister will know that I have been involved in promoting a dedicated rail freight scheme to build a rail freight line from the channel tunnel to Glasgow, through the major industrial areas of Britain. We have a detailed scheme that is feasible, practicable and economically worked out. I have put a submission to the Transport Committee, spoken in the Chamber about it, met senior officials in the Department for Transport and spoken to Ministers on many occasions. That is a real scheme. We have to be part of the Europe-wide rail freight network, as it will mean the possibility of transferring at least 5 million lorry loads of traffic on to rail each year, much of which will go through the channel tunnel and on to the continent.

I have spoken to logistics managers for Tesco who would love to be able to bring their wine and other things from the continent of Europe—for example, from Bordeaux direct by train to Birmingham, Glasgow or wherever. That cannot be done without heavy investment in track capacity and providing the capability to take serious container traffic to a much greater extent than currently exists on the railways. That would free up other railway lines for more and faster passenger trains. Segregation of freight and passenger trains where possible, as is being done on the continent of Europe, is clearly the way forward. Those on the continent are doing things right in respect of railways, but we are not. I have not yet persuaded my hon. Friends the Ministers at the Department for Transport to say yes to our scheme, but I think that they will in time. We can then say that we are greening transport, too.

Finally, I shall talk a little bit about what one might say is another hobbyhorse of mine: the common fisheries policy. The common fisheries policy is irrational nonsense that has led directly to the overfishing of seas. The only way forward to guarantee that fish stocks survive for the future is to re-establish the old national fishing waters and for each member state with its own maritime areas to defend its fishing grounds. Member states will then realise that their future depends on husbanding their fish stocks well, as is done in Norway, which is outside the European Union.

It has been said to me many times in humour that fish can swim. Humorously, if I were a fish, I would swim in the Norwegian waters rather than outside them, because I would be less likely to be caught. Nevertheless, there are more fish stocks around Norway than around the rest of Europe, because it has its own waters, is outside the common fisheries policy and looks after its stocks better than we do. The only way forward that guarantees that fish stocks across the whole range of fish will be given time to recover is for countries to take back their national fishing waters.

Mr. MacShane: If someone catches a fish in the North sea, how do they know whether it is German, Danish, Dutch, Belgian, Swedish, English or Scottish?

Kelvin Hopkins: Clearly, fish do not speak languages, so that is very difficult. They do not wear badges or flags. My right hon. Friend makes a point that has been made to me many times—fish can swim. However, if the sea is sufficiently big for fish to live in one area rather than another and if there are large shoals of fish around Norway and no shoals of fish around Britain, something has happened to the fish around Britain, which I suggest is the result of overfishing and it might just be because of the common fisheries policy. This is over-simplification and there are various detailed policies that I debated recently in the European Standing Committee with the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw), who is responsible for fisheries. However, the common fisheries policy was a give-away at the time of negotiating entry to the European Union. It is irrational nonsense and I urge the Minister to put the case for at least the possibility in a few years' time of re-establishing national fishing waters and abolishing the common fisheries policy.

I am convinced that that is the way forward. I am sure that, if we said that we were going to retake our national fishing waters in five or seven years' time and gave the European Union time to adjust to that thought, common sense would prevail in the end. The Minister responsible for fisheries has said that if we did that, we would be thrown out of the Common Market—sorry, I mean the European Union; I am using the old terminology. I think that it is highly unlikely that we would be thrown out of the European Union. It has a very big trade surplus with us and the rest of the European Union benefits so much in economic terms from Britain's membership that it is unlikely that it would expel us.

If we made our case now and said that we would abolish the common fisheries policy or re-establish our own waters, we would be doing a great service to the fish stocks in our waters and in the waters around the rest of Europe and helping other countries in the European Union as well as ourselves. It is not just a selfish nationalist policy; it is a policy of conservation. It is a green policy, or a green sea policy. It would ensure the restoration of fish stocks that have been attacked to a dangerous degree in recent decades.

I could speak at greater length on a number of other subjects, as I am sure you appreciate, Mr. Bayley, but I have probably had more than my fair share of the time. I apologise, because I have to attend another meeting now, but thank you.

3.52 pm

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Before he goes to his next meeting, I congratulate the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins). He spoke for nearly half an hour. I did not agree with much of what he said and he did not really speak about the paper before us, the annual policy strategy for 2009—[Interruption.] In that, he was very like the right hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane), who made a fantastic speech, most of which I agreed with. It elucidated many issues. He did at least make some reference to the APS for 2009, so perhaps he does not deserve so much criticism.

Mr. Drew: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: In a second. To be fair to the hon. Member for Luton, North and the right hon. Member for Rotherham, there is not a lot in the document before us.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): Order. Before the hon. Member for Stroud intervenes, I point out that it is for the Chair to decide whether contributions are relevant to the topic for debate. I hope that that is not the purpose of the intervention.

Mr. Drew: Thank you, Mr. Bayley. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) is right. This is the best we can do. For a document that is supposed to allow us to scrutinise the whole EU policy or direction of strategy, it does not say much. We in this House need much better. Whatever the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) and my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), they have to speak on everything because there is such a limited amount that they can speak on according to the document.

Mr. Davey: I agree. It is not absolutely clear what purpose the document is intended to serve. The Minister, in introducing the debate, said that it was a strategy document. It does not appear to be terribly strategic in the way in which it is presented. In the House of Lords report on the 2008 annual policy strategy, criticism was made along those lines. The other place questioned whether it was intended to be a snapshot of where the European Commission was at and what work was in progress, or whether it was supposed to be a list for a future work programme. It was not clear whether it was supposed to be a consultation document involving the other institutions and member states. If these debates are to be meaningful and we are to contribute to what is going on as a British Parliament—

Mr. Jim Murphy: A UK Parliament.

Mr. Davey: The Minister wishes to correct me and I am happy to be corrected. If we are to do that, it is incumbent on the European Commission to send us documents that are rather more meaningful and have much more clarity about both their purpose and their content.

It may be that because we are coming towards the end of the Barroso Commission and we face European Parliament elections next year, the Commission does not have much more to complete. Perhaps it has completed most of the work that it set out when it came together after the previous set of elections. That may well excuse the Commission and this strategy, but when we have these debates, we need a bit of context about their purpose.

As I think was implied by the Chair of the European Scrutiny Committee, the hon. Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty), perhaps this is an early warning system; perhaps it is flagging up what may be down the line. However, for a document meant as an early warning system, it does not give much detail, so there is not much that can be flagged up from it. I am unclear about its purpose and although I welcome more debates and more scrutiny—that is an important development—the European Commission will have to help us a little more if we are to perform that task.

My reading of the document suggests that if it is anything at the moment in the form in which it has been presented, it is a work programme. I refer hon. Members to pages 14 to 19, the annexe, in which it talks about the key actions envisaged for 2009. That seems to be the meat of the document and I want to ask the Minister questions about that meat later, because if we are to have a purpose today, we should understand what it is in that.

I hope that the Minister will take my concerns back to the Council of Ministers and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. I would not be surprised if they were widely shared. Yes, we want these debates and documents that would set out an annual policy strategy—that would be useful—but we need more in them if that is to serve a useful purpose.

One reason why I would welcome this type of debate and document, if they were done properly, is that I think that the European Union needs to move on from the incessant debates about institutional reform and structures. Whatever is happening today in Ireland, whatever the result tomorrow and whether or not the Lisbon treaty ends up being ratified, we need to move on from the incessant debates that we have had about tinkering with the way in which the institutions work.

I personally support the Lisbon treaty. It makes valuable improvements, not least because the European Union has grown in size. With so many more member states, it seems sensible that some aspects of the institutional framework are reformed, which is the whole purpose of the Lisbon treaty; it is the main drive behind it. It may not have gone down terribly well with the Irish people, but the idea of having 27 commissioners, 28 if Croatia joins and 29 if Turkey joins, makes a nonsense of the Commission. One of the beneficial aspects of the Lisbon treaty is that it would streamline the number of commissioners and the bureaucracy and provide better value for money. It would be a shame if we lost that.

However, if the Lisbon treaty is not ratified and we do lose it, that does not mean that the European Commission cannot function. That has never been an argument that we have advanced. The European Commission, the European Union, will have to work out a way forward, but it should not say, "Okay, the Lisbon treaty has been lost because Ireland didn't ratify it"—if that is what happens—"but let's start another round of discussions about how we reform the institutions." We must not do that. We need to move on and talk about policy—what the European Commission and the European Union institutions are doing and how they are benefiting the citizens whom we come to this place to represent and the citizens of the wider European Union. To focus on that is therefore sensible, and documents such as this can help.

The document points out a number of important areas, and the European Commission and the European Union should focus on them next year. Development of the Lisbon agenda, with its strategy for jobs and growth, could not be more critical. It has been important for many years, but it will be even more important as the world economy, our economy and the European economy come across tougher times. The fact that oil and food prices are high has been referred to; we clearly are in tougher economic times. Whether or not it has an impact on this country or our trading partners in pushing through things such as deregulation and reducing the administrative burden from Europe, that agenda is clearly sensible and one that we should support.

On page 14 and at the top of page 15, the document sets out how the Lisbon strategy for jobs and growth will be developed in the forthcoming year. I have some questions for the Minister on the key actions that are envisaged. The second point in the annex is "Legislative proposals aimed at reducing administrative burdens, as part of the Commission's Action Programme".

That sounds great. I looked for evidence of what those legislative proposals might be, but I cannot find any. Will the Minister tell us what is envisaged? Is he aware of what those proposals might be? If it is a genuine deregulatory approach, we shall certainly look upon it with some enthusiasm.

We then come to the subheading "Single Market and Competition", which includes:

"Recommendation on shared partnerships with Member States".

I looked in the main text of the document, and on page 4 it states:

"A key follow-up to the 2007 Single Market Review will be an initiative on shared partnerships between the Commission and Member States to apply and enforce Single Market law, clarifying the respective roles of the Commission and Member States and their shared responsibilities in making the Single Market work."

I do not understand that, and I hope that the Minister can explain it. I do not know what "shared partnerships" are. Neither do I know what is meant by a "New Approach Directive", which is mentioned in the following sentence. I have heard of directives, of course, but I have no knowledge of an "approach directive". Will the Minister enlighten us?

Under the title of jobs and growth, the document talks of the Commission stepping up action in the "area of competition". The Minister will have the support of the Liberal Democrats if the Government push this strongly, particularly looking at anti-trust issues and preventing the misuse of state aid. However, the liberalisation agenda of the energy sector is critical. High energy prices are taking their toll on certain industries, so we need to push that programme.

I urge the Minister to see whether work can be done by the Government and the European Commission on the refinery sector. There is some concern that it is not only the rise in the commodity prices that feeds through to the pumps and the higher fuel costs faced by our constituents and industry but the pressures in the system resulting from a lack of refinery infrastructure that have created some of the problems that we have seen with supply and demand. I put it to the Minister that that may be an area for competitive inquiry, either by the EU or the Government.

The final area in the growth and jobs aspect of the document that I want to touch upon is the fact that the Commission is going to "work on a renewed VAT Strategy".

It then speaks of the "preparation of initiatives on VAT grouping and on the VAT treatment of public authorities".

I am not quite sure what that amounts to, and some clarification would be welcome. However, I urge the Minister—I hope that he will discuss the matter with his Treasury colleagues—to focus on the VAT treatment of charities with the Commission.

The United Kingdom is not unique, but it has a much more vibrant voluntary and charitable sector than many member states. The way that VAT affects charities in this country can be extremely damaging—not to all charities perhaps, but certainly to those that are not able, through their trading and other activities, to pass on the VAT to the final customer, as is the case in the commercial sector. I do not know whether the renewed VAT strategy will touch upon that problem, but the Government need to consider that question.

I move on to the section of the document that talks of a "sustainable Europe". It focuses on environmental issues in what I have described as a work programme. I welcome the increased emphasis on policies to tackle climate change. Although it is part of the Lisbon treaty, the European Commission and the European Union are doing a lot of work outside the treaty. That is one of the most important arguments for the European Union, and it is good to see a large part of the strategy work programme with such details. There is some substance in it—things that we can get our hands on, things that we can understand—and I support several things in it.

For instance, it talks of setting out the EU's position for the November 2009 Copenhagen climate conference. That is critical. In moving on from Kyoto and Bali, the EU has been leading the global debate. It is critical for the member states of the European Union to take a really strong and coherent position—not only for the UK or Europe, but for the whole world. It is an essential piece of work, and I hope that the Minister and his colleagues will contribute strongly to it.

Implementation of the revised emissions trading scheme will be important during the next year or two. The first round of the ETS was not as successful as it might have been, but given that it was innovative and given that we were leading again, it was a valuable exercise. It is worth pointing out that, not least because of increased fuel prices, windfall gains were made by a number of energy companies as a result of the first round of the ETS. I hope that it will not happen in the second round, although I fear that it might. The emissions trading scheme is critical. In the first round, it dealt with about 40 per cent. of carbon emissions in the Union. It now takes account of aviation, which is welcome. I hope that it will take account of emissions from freight transport, including from shipping. Again, that is a welcome development. I hope that the Minister well tell us how he thinks implementation will work. Are we are on track? What are the key milestones?

I now turn to the implementation of the energy efficiency action plan. I welcome it, because I am absolutely convinced that we can do an awful lot more than has been managed before. Although most aspects of energy efficiency policy should be considered at the national as well as the local level, it is good that the EU is working on the matter—particularly in relation to the workings of the single market. Inevitably, regulations on things such as lighting and other consumer goods will have to be made, in part, at a European level. The proposal for a new initiative on energy labelling of tyres, and measures on domestic lighting and incandescent bulbs are a good step forward, and we should support them. There will inevitably be problems with implementation, as we move from one system to another, but it has to be the way forward. I understand that if the EU gets rid of incandescent light bulbs, that measure alone will save 20 million tonnes of carbon emissions. That is the equivalent of 25 medium-sized power stations—it is big stuff. It is important that the European Union leads the way: if it is going to happen, we should welcome the document.

I could talk about a number of things that are in the action plan, but I wanted finally to focus on the section titled "Europe as a World Partner", which is a key part of the Commission's future work. That status is often underplayed and under-presented. We have debates, particularly with Conservative Front Benchers, about the operation of European security, defence and foreign policy, but, clearly, they depend on unanimity. Some of the concerns that are raised about the operation of that policy level are not valid, because we have a veto. Because we are part of the European Union, we speak with a louder voice. We can work with partners that we can listen to more effectively. Also, people want to join us, so we can promote the values and rights that are at the heart of the EU.

[Mr. Davey]

In the coming year, within the strategy, there is a work programme to make progress with accession negotiations with Croatia and Turkey, which is absolutely right. Bringing in states from the western Balkans is important. The Liberal Democrats have always supported the idea of Turkey becoming a full member of the European Union. It would be historic if a secular Muslim state joined and was welcomed into the European Union. It would be fantastic. It would be great for trade and good for getting Turkey up to the human rights standards that the EU seeks to promote, but it would be far more than that. We often forget the historic messages that the EU sends. My party and I are proud to stand up as strong supporters of the EU. I believe that the European Union is one of the greatest steps forward in the history of humankind. That goes against what one would read in the press, and it is an unfashionable view, but I think that all those states gathering around tables to talk to one another, solve problems and co-operate, with the rule of law and a degree of democratic accountability, following due process transparently, is fantastic. Bringing a secular Muslim state such as Turkey into that kind of club would be historic, so it would be fantastic if work was done in 2009 to pursue that goal.

The strategy addresses the important foreign policy issue of making progress and working on a new framework agreement with Russia. We are all aware of some of the worrying developments in Russia. The problem for the EU is that we have not been able to agree on our approach because of divergences between some of the big member states—between Germany and France and Germany and the UK. It might be that we are unable to achieve a common approach, but it would help if we could develop an approach that we consider to be in Britain's interest and that we can persuade other people to take up. If Russia is able to pick different member states off, it is powerful; if Russia faces a united EU, strengthened by a common agreement to which states have signed up through a proper process, it becomes much weaker. Together we have a much stronger voice, and we will not allow the bully-boy approach that Putin adopted—we have yet to see whether Medvedev adopts the same approach—to succeed. That is important for Britain and Europe.

The final part of the long work programme under the title "Europe as a World Partner" is on the implementation of the Doha development agreement. The Foreign Secretary touched on that last night when he gave a speech at Lancaster house—we were celebrating Her Majesty's birthday. The US presidential elections will be out of the way in November, and one of the new President's first tasks, with the new Congress, will be to engage on the matter. There will be problems because, whether or not the Democrats win the White House, they are likely to strengthen their control over Congress. I do not know whether that will mean that there will be a majority in both Houses for the Doha agreement. The last time I talked to American politicians and policy makers about the agreement, they said that Washington is not all that interested because there is not a lot in it for the US. They say, "You guys in Europe talk about a development round, but it doesn't really do very much for us". Hopefully, there will be a new atmosphere in American politics, and they might take a more enlightened approach. If so, the European Union should be ready to push it forward and achieve something.

The document states:

"If appropriate, implementation of the Doha Development Agreement".

I think I know what the Commission means by that, but I am not sure. In any case, we, as a member state, ought to push for it. No trade agreement contains everything one wishes for, but one can get 75 per cent. of it—that is the way of trade politics. I would welcome progress on that.

I repeat that I have concerns about the process, but the fact that I have been able to speak for so long and refer to the document suggests that it has some value. However, that value is compartmentalised. The European Commission is doing this and wants to make progress on that, which is all good. We can discuss it and put our points of view, but it does not amount to a strategy. If that is what the Commission is seeking to do, it needs to think again. Having said that, I am looking forward to the Minister's response to my detailed questions.

4.17 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): May I offer the apologies of my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), who would normally speak in a European debate from the Conservative Front Bench? As the Minister knows, he is attending the wedding this afternoon of a member of his staff, and I am sure that the whole House wishes the happy couple every success in their marriage.

I share some of the analysis of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) of the document. I could not make up my mind whether it was a strategy document or a work programme. It is something of a cross between a White Paper and a Queen's Speech, but it lacked the precision of the latter and associated documents because it does not tell us in detail exactly which measures of European legislation the Commission intends to introduce in 2009. The strategic analysis and presentation lacks coherence—it is a bag of all-sorts.

Having said that, I am able to welcome a fair amount of the document, including the continuing commitment of the Commission to enlargement, and I strongly endorse its determination to press ahead with the negotiations with Turkey. The Conservatives have always supported Turkey's accession to the European Union. For the broader reasons alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, it will be in Europe's greater geopolitical interests for Turkey's membership to become reality.

It is good that the Commission mentioned in its document the need to enhance relationships with the countries of north Africa. I am glad to see that the right hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) has returned to the Chamber, because he made some important points on the way in which the interests of European and north African countries are interconnected. It is important for us to foster those relationships. He also gave a friendly but appropriate warning to the British Government and to Britain as a country that British business is sometimes slow off the mark in getting to grips with the opportunities available in north Africa. When I have talked to representatives of those countries, they have been keen to encourage investment, trade and cultural and educational relationships with the United Kingdom.

I welcome the Commission's words about Doha, but like the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton, I think that its completion should be a priority; it should not be conditional on circumstances. The EU should be pressing for it urgently. I also welcome the Commission's words about strengthening the work of the Transatlantic Economic Council. At a time when economic difficulties around the world are strengthening the voices of protectionism, it is vital that the European Commission and the major players in the European Union maintain their commitment to free markets and free trade. Bringing down the barriers that divide us from the members of the North American Free Trade Agreement is an important initiative that can be taken in the right direction.

In general, it is my belief that the Barroso Commission has been more sympathetic to the needs of business and enterprise than its predecessors. It has adopted a friendlier overall attitude to small and medium-sized enterprises in particular, which is to be welcomed. I liked what the document said about the need for emphasis on the quality rather than the quantity of European legislation, and it was refreshing to read a Commission document that talked about needing a year to see to the proper implementation of previously announced initiatives, rather than wishing to press ahead with a whole new raft of directives and regulations, as though that were some test of the effectiveness of the Commission or the EU more generally.

However, I hope that the Minister and his colleagues in other Departments will keep a close eye on what those initiatives actually mean in practice. Do the simplification rolling programme and the action programme to reduce administrative burdens deliver the reductions in business costs that the manufacturing and service industries in the United Kingdom so desperately need as they fight the ever fiercer challenge of global economic competition?

We must bear it in mind that there are pressures in the opposite direction. I mentioned how language about trade around the world seems to be becoming more protectionist. I certainly hope, if the Democratic candidate wins the US presidential election, that some of the protectionist language that we heard on the campaign trail will not translate into US policy, because that would be harmful to this country's interests and the interests of those seeking growth and prosperity throughout the world.

We must consider what is happening in Europe. If the Lisbon treaty comes into force, it will contain that significant shift in language that has relegated free markets and free trade, one of the defining features of the European Union, to a lesser role. We debated that in the Chamber in connection with the treaty. The French hailed it as a great victory for their approach to economic matters and a defeat for the forces of the Anglo-Saxon world.

We should be a bit concerned about some of the positions adopted by our own Government. Only yesterday, the Financial Times reported that the British Government had entered a "non aggression pact" under which this country

"agreed to drop Britain's long-standing demands for sweeping pan-European electricity and gas liberalisation."

When the Minister responds, I hope that he might be prepared to spell out the terms of that reported deal. To what extent has the United Kingdom resiled from the oft-expressed ambition of liberalising the European energy markets to at least the same extent as in our own country? What does he believe will be the impact on British business and British consumers of such a change in our negotiating position? We know, for example, that so far it has not proved possible to get some continental gas suppliers to sell gas to United Kingdom distributors for the same lower price that they are prepared to offer distributors on the continent. Are our Government satisfied with that state of affairs? If not, what initiatives do they plan within the EU to end that anomaly in what is supposed to be a single market?

I hope, too, that the Minister might say a word about the concessions that the Government recently agreed on the agency workers directive. He will know that the role of agency and temporary staff is of greater significance in the British economy, especially to small and medium-sized businesses, than in the other major economies of western Europe. Have the Government assessed, in particular, the impact on SMEs of the measure that they are now prepared to endorse? Have they thought through the possible impact of such a directive at a time when the British economy is going through a severe downturn?

I was troubled by the words on page 4 of the strategy document about financial services:

"The Commission will actively engage in the response to the global financial turbulence, which will require long-term adjustments in the regulatory and supervisory environment for financial services."

What does that mean? There is certainly a case—

Mr. Jim Murphy: Transparency.

Mr. Lidington: Well, I am certainly not going to stand here and argue that there is no case for revising systems of regulation and supervision, but it seems vital that the United Kingdom, whatever party is in government, stand up firmly for the principle that light regulation is what tends to breed successful financial service industries. What has benefited the City of London has been the ability to innovate in an on the whole successful system of self-regulation since the days of the big bang. If the European Union, no doubt for well-intended reasons, goes down a path of ever-tighter regulation and stricter government—or supranational government—supervision, the people who will cheer are those who want to establish financial centres in Switzerland or anywhere else outside EU boundaries.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman makes a strong point. Was he as concerned as I was to read that Chancellor Merkel seems to be on an offensive, suggesting that the Anglo-Saxon model of approach to regulation has had its day? The sentence that he read out may echo the idea that down the line, there could be a European-wide financial services authority. That would be extremely worrying.

Mr. Lidington: I dread the thought of a pan-European FSA, not least because the City of London has been of huge benefit to the British economy, in terms of investment and employment, over the past couple of decades. It is vital that we do nothing that prejudices the success of the City as a generator of income and jobs for British people.

[Mr. Lidington]

I would question, too, whether some of the initiatives listed by the Commission are worth it at all. I really question why we need a European institute of technology. We can agree that technology is a good thing, that innovation is to be welcomed, and that we should support contact and the dissemination of ideas between different enterprises and academic institutions. However, Europe is richly endowed with universities and institutes with track records of technological innovation and a history of publishing and sharing their ideas. Will anything be gained by having an additional institution funded by Europe's taxpayers that cannot be gained, to the same extent or greater, by leaving universities and other institutes to act on their own? Will a central European institute of technology be more dynamic and innovative than Europe's existing diverse institutions?

I welcome the Commission's continuing commitment to action on climate change, but although I have no problem with supporting its objectives, we must acknowledge that the main instrument of policy—the EU emissions trading scheme—is itself flawed. I have always supported emissions trading as a way of introducing a market mechanism to reinforce desirable, environmentally friendly behaviour on the part of companies, but the record of the European ETS is surely that too many credits were issued at the start and that, as a result, we do not yet have a real price for carbon in Europe with which to make that scheme effective and to introduce a dynamic that drives companies to reduce their use of carbon over the years. If the Government share that assessment of what is wrong with the ETS, what are they planning to do about it? Will they campaign in the Council of Ministers and try to assemble allies in the EU to secure improvements to the scheme? Will the revisions to the ETS mentioned in the document actually remedy the flaws to which I have referred, or do we need further work before we have an instrument fit for purpose?

The common immigration policy makes up a fair bit of the Commission's strategy document, and I would be intrigued to know whether the Government have made up their minds on whether they plan to use their opt-ins, if the Lisbon treaty comes into effect. I would also be grateful for clarification of what some of the Commission's proposed measures would entail. For example, page 16 of the document makes reference to directives for specific sectors of industry in relation to the entry and stay of legal migrants. I presume that that would apply to people who, in the British context, are admitted to the UK under work permit or seasonal worker schemes of one sort or another. What concerns me is that we could end up with a European directive designed for a sector, when the significance and labour needs of that sector might significantly differ from one member state to another. How can we design a directive on economic migrants that will work in Greece, Estonia, the UK, Portugal and Malta, and which will make sense in the particular business circumstances in each of those very different economies?

The Commission is clearly very concerned in the document about the need to connect the institutions of the European Union more closely to the lives and everyday priorities of the citizens of European countries. That theme comes through quite powerfully in the sections of the policy strategy entitled "Putting the Citizen First" and "Communicating Europe". I agree with the objective, but I am not at all sure whether it is working in practice. I noted, when the European Parliament had its initial debate on President Barroso's policy strategy, that several Members made reference, in the context of the section on putting the citizen first, to the need to sort out cross-border entitlements on health treatment. MEPs were calling for the Commission to make that a high priority for its programme of work for the year. What is the Government analysis of the likelihood of such a measure coming forward? What would be the impact on the NHS of much greater freedom for people to seek medical treatment across national borders within the EU? Do the Government endorse that principle?

On page 6 of the document, in the section entitled, "Putting the Citizen First", the Commission states:

> "Food safety, animal health and animal welfare will be the subject of new proposals and monitoring activities will be stepped up".

That could be okay, and something that people could welcome, but it raises the question: what does it mean when we get down to the detailed practice? Will we open up our newspapers and find that they are full of indignant owners of bed-and-breakfast establishments complaining that, owing to European legislation, people want to stop them letting the family dog into the kitchen if they are to continue to have guests, and are telling them to choose between barring Rover from part of the family home and giving up their small, family bed-and-breakfast business?

All of us in this place know that sometimes, that sort of over-regulation stems from Brussels, but sometimes it is down to Whitehall gold-plating or to the way in which the local enforcement authority interprets the words sent down to them. Without looking into the issue in greater detail than I have had time to do today, I do not know which it is in this case. In this country, however, when we debate regulations that impinge upon everyday life, we should take every opportunity to argue that: first, we must base our proposals on a common-sense evaluation of an actual, rather than a theoretical, risk; secondly, we must be sensible to the distinction between large enterprises employing large numbers of people, and small businesses run by families, almost as an adjunct to the family way of life; and thirdly, we must understand how people in very different countries actually live their lives day by day. Regulations must seem sensible to people when going about their daily routines.

The section on "Communicating Europe" states that 2009 will be a very important year for Europe. I supported what Mr. Barroso said before the European Parliament, which was that it will give us the chance to celebrate 20 years since the fall of the Berlin wall, and the reunification of a continent that had been so horribly divided since 1914. That really is something for everyone to take pride in in 2009, whichever side we take over the Lisbon treaty.

If we want to communicate about Europe and if we are to engage the public seriously in debates about Europe, European leaders must stop treating the peoples of Europe as tiresome extras. Page 8 of the document talks about the Commission seeking > "to maximise its work in partnership with the other European institutions and Member States to help spark a lively debate on European policies in the run-up to the European elections and beyond."

We have had a wonderful opportunity for lively debate this year, but the leaders of the Commission and, apart from the Irish, the leaders of the Council of Europe have funked it. The people could have been consulted about the treaty that those leaders have argued would bring enormous benefits to every member state and their citizens.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton shimmied elegantly around the topic without mentioning that, yesterday evening, the votes of 65 Liberal Democrat peers ensured the defeat of the referendum proposal in the House of Lords. It is ironic that he has sought and attained martyrdom on the Floor of the House on the cause of having referendums on the Lisbon treaty and on Britain's membership of the EU, but that when exactly the same proposal was made in the other place, all his colleagues in the House of Lords lined up with the Government to vote it down. I still have not worked out whether that is simply because he and the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) have lost all authority over their colleagues in the House of Lords, or because the Liberal Democrats wanted all along to make sure that the public did not get the say that they were promised in 2005.

Mr. Davey: For the record, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would like to tell the House that the Conservative peers, Lords Heseltine, Patten, Brittan, Hurd, Howe, Tugendhat and Bowness, some of whom are former Foreign Secretaries and Cabinet Ministers, all voted with the Liberal Democrats and the Labour Government in the House of Lords against the Conservative position in the House of Commons.

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Gentleman is accurate in what he says, but he does not mention that those Conservative peers are not members of the Front-Bench team. The Liberal Democrat peers who voted in the House of Lords in the opposite direction to how his party voted in the House of Commons included his party's official spokesmen, who sit with him and his party leader in their Front-Bench meetings and are supposed to be collectively responsible for shaping Liberal Democrat policy. That is the difference between his party and mine on this issue.

Whatever view we take on Lisbon, the principle that this document misses is that if Europe's political leaders continue to deny the peoples of Europe their say, they should not be surprised if the public look on what is happening in Europe with a mixture of apathy and cynicism. That is not healthy for this country or for the European Union as a whole. If we are to build the sort of European co-operation that will be in the interests of the people of every member state, the way forward is to have greater openness and genuine engagement with the public.

4.44 pm

Mr. Jim Murphy: I am delighted to respond to the debate, which has, to quote the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), been another wonderful opportunity for a lively debate on Europe. I am glad that we have such a thing, on occasion.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) for heckling him about the constitutional nature of our Parliament being the United Kingdom Parliament rather than the Great British Parliament, but we must remember the important role that Members of Parliament from Northern Ireland play in our proceedings.

I should also like to share in the celebration regarding the absence of the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois). Of course, it is not his absence that gives us cause to celebrate, but the reason for it: the wedding of his assistant, Adele Smith. In a unique European union all of their own, she is marrying a gentleman from France, whose name escapes me at the moment. I think that we are all delighted about that occasion.

In the hour and a quarter that I have to respond to the debate—is that right, Mr. Bayley?

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): It is just three quarters of an hour, to make sure that the speech fits the time.

Mr. Murphy: I shall have to curtail my remarks then, if I have only three quarters of an hour.

It is interesting that, other than in the past two or three minutes of well-rehearsed jousting, few party political points and many important, specific points have been made. Between them, the hon. Members for Aylesbury and for Kingston and Surbiton have raised 40 separate questions and points. I sense that I would lose my audience, to the extent that there is one, if I were to respond in detail to all those points from the two Front Benchers, but I shall do what I can not to try the patience of the hon. Gentlemen by taking up the entire 45 minutes available.

It will be helpful if I put on the record again, almost verbatim, what I said earlier, to reaffirm the context in which the debate takes place. The annual policy strategy is not a set of formal policy proposals, but an aspirational document. That is the understanding across member states and of the Commission. The specific documents are relevant to the Commission's legal work plan, published in October, and many of the specific points raised by hon. Members today are relevant to that.

There has been a genuine observation—frustration might be too strong a word for it—that the document lacks detail, notwithstanding that we could sustain a debate on it for perhaps three and a half hours between six of us. That is a reflection on the nature of the document, but it is also a reflection on the nature of where Europe is today: on the cusp of having a new Commission and Parliament as well as new senior representatives in 2009. That will be the end of one five-year work programme and the start of another. Most of the major legislative proposals tabled in last year's work programme were for introduction this year. It would be fairer to describe that programme as a six-month programme than an annual programme—perhaps an eight-month programme at its most ambitious—with the European elections taking place halfway through the year to which it applies.

Let me address some of the points that have been raised. I hope that hon. Members will accept that it is not practical to respond to every point that has been raised. If hon. Members will allow me, I shall respond first to the points made by those who are still in their places. I think that that is the most appropriate thing to do.

[Mr. Jim Murphy]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) followed an excellent speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty), who is the Chairman of the European Scrutiny Committee. I wish to put on record again the excellent work that he and others on the Committee do. My right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham spoke largely, though not exclusively, about the western Balkans. Based on his visit to Kosovo, he rightly talked about his experiences there and the sense of shared frustration in many European capitals that the EU of 27 was not able unanimously to recognise the new state of Kosovo. However, the vast majority—20 of the 27 countries—have recognised it.

The frustration that my right hon. Friend experiences helps to disprove one of the common Conservative misrepresentations of the nature of Europe. The fact is that every member state makes its own decision on foreign policy. The member states came to their own view about whether to recognise Kosovo. As he rightly said, 42 countries have so far recognised Kosovo. I had the fantastic privilege this morning of meeting the Foreign Minister of Liechtenstein, which is one of those 42 counties. We are fundamentally committed to the settlement in Kosovo based on the Ahtisaari proposals, including the territorial integrity of a united Kosovo with no partition and respect for minorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) intervened on my right hon. Friend and talked about respect for minorities in the north, but those of us who have paid close attention to Kosovo, including my right hon. Friend, know that most of the Serbs do not live in the north. They are in enclaves throughout the country. There is a concentration of them in the north, of course, but the majority do not live there. Some 60 per cent. live in enclaves elsewhere. My right hon. Friend will know that there is an impending donors conference on Kosovo, which is of great importance. I share his observation that the more closely the EU mission can be involved, the more significant it will be in helping to rebuild Kosovo.

My right hon. Friend also made some wider reflections on the western Balkans in relation to the annual plan, and he spoke about Serbia. Although it is for the Serbian people to decide who wins Serbian elections, it was an important statement of their aspiration that they voted for the most European-inclined parties in their general election. I wish to put on record again Her Majesty's Government's view on the condition of Serbian compliance with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. I was at the signing of the stabilisation agreement with other Europe and Foreign Ministers of the 27 countries of the EU and with Serbia, and there is no doubt that the condition still applies. However, the judgment was made that the date at which it will apply should be deferred until after the signing of that agreement, for reasons that my right hon. Friend is well aware of. The EU countries made that judgment together, and that was the best way to progress. Of course, it is good news that one of the indictees was arrested yesterday.

We shall continue to work to find a resolution to the issue about the name of Macedonia and its disagreement with Greece. I had the opportunity to meet the ambassador of Macedonia last night at the reception for Her Majesty's birthday. Croatia, of course, will almost certainly be the next member of the European Union. We all acknowledge that.

I visited Bosnia relatively recently. The important hurdle there has been police reform, and we must continue to show support for EU representative Lajcak. I have spoken to Republic Srpska's Prime Minister Dodik on the telephone and reaffirmed that we believe in Bosnia's territorial integrity as a unitary state. It is important to put on record that we are not in the business of carving up modern countries in the Balkans on mono-ethnic lines. I look forward to following in my right hon. Friend's footsteps once more when I travel to Kosovo next week, and I hope that my words about the western Balkans reassure him.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) made 26 or 27 separate points, and I shall try to respond to many of them, but if there are some that he thinks I have missed, we can—I am absolutely certain that we will—continue the conversation.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned energy. I have said before, and it bears repeating, that energy is an issue on which we have got out of kilter. The priority given to energy policy in the public conversation is not as it should be. It is one of the biggest strategic challenges facing Europe, but the conversation about it often relegates it to seventh, eighth, ninth or 10th in the list of priorities, or perhaps even further down. In a world of increased energy demands and curtailed energy supply, reflected by increased prices, solutions that are climate-sensitive but free from the interference of geopolitics are of fundamental strategic importance to the EU. When I was in Azerbaijan recently and met the president, that was a core component of our conversation. We mentioned the southern corridor and the Nabucco pipeline. I spoke with our ambassador in Turkmenistan this morning about natural gas supplies there. Energy is an issue of great and fundamental importance. I am not au fait with the detail of the refineries sector, but I shall look into the hon. Gentleman's fair point about it.

Energy is one of the matters that concerns politicians across the political divide. There is no party politics, which shows the importance of energy sources and supplies and the diversity, security and predictability of routes to market. It is disappointing that on occasion, Russia has used energy policy as a tool of foreign policy. That frustration is reflected in other European capitals.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned climate change, entirely properly. Europe has to show leadership up to Copenhagen and beyond on our renewables targets and the deal that we have signed up to. Of course we have to be sensitive to national pressures on occasion, such as the niche markets in German car production, but if Europe does not lead on climate change and sustainable consumption, on developing low-carbon technologies and on the type of work that the hon. Gentleman spoke about—consumer and climate-sensitive ways to change customer behaviour—it is difficult to imagine how we can construct a global deal on climate change with the United States, Russia, China, Brazil or any other strong or emerging economy.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Government's position on Turkey. In light of the constitutional court judgment about the wearing of the hijab, it is important to put on record our view that Governments should be decided by the electorate, not by the constitutional court. It is a bad signal for a modernising Turkey to be caught in that domestic crossroads in deciding its future. The Government's view is that Turkey's secular destiny is not in jeopardy under the governance of the AK party, but the constitutional court will come to its decisions.

The importance of Turkey's accession to the EU is that although it must resolve the situation at its domestic crossroads and be a constitutionally guaranteed secularised state, it is also at an international crossroads in its relationships with the middle east, the Islamic world and across the globe. It will be another strategic addition to the EU as an organisation. Turkey is an addition economically, culturally and in all sorts of different ways. The issue of admitting Turkey would be a remarkable opportunity for the European Union to expand its reach and influence beyond its current borders.

A number of other issues were raised about energy efficiency by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton. Energy efficiency is important, which is why the proposals in the European Union 2020 strategy are about standard labelling of appliances; minimum equal standards for buildings; vehicle efficiency standards, and much more.

I would like to turn briefly to some of the questions raised by the hon. Member for Aylesbury; we look forward in the future to having the opportunity perhaps to hear from him again in European debates. He raised a number of points, including points about Doha; better regulation; economic migration; justice and home affairs; the energy market; agency workers; the European institute of technology; communications, and much else besides. I hope that he will accept that I am not attempting to avoid answering any question if I do not go into all of those points in great detail; it is my style to try to answer questions, but he would not thank me for doing so in great detail.

Regarding Doha, quite simply it is the Government's single greatest trade policy priority. We want to see a deal and the Secretary-General of the World Trade Organisation thinks that there still can be a deal, but time is against us. There is a need to come to at least a preliminary deal on agricultural products. So we are working from the Prime Minister down within Government to get a deal on Doha.

On the issue of better regulation, the fact is that the Commission is making progress on better regulation from a relatively slow start. Mr. Bayley, you will be aware that I was previously the Minister responsible for better regulation in the Cabinet Office; I must curtail my own remarks here to just a few sentences, although having done that job for a year I could offer more than a few. As I say, the fact is that the Commission has made improvements from a slow start, but it has to go further: it has to have better and wider consultations; it has to involve small businesses in particular in consultations; in its impact assessments, it has to see how much more it could do to give a monetarised value of the likely impact of measures, and it should revisit its impact assessments to see how effective they were in predicting the actual cost of regulation.

So there is much more that still can be done about better regulation. However, this Commission, under President Barroso, has made real progress and there is a real appetite in member states to see further progress being made and the United Kingdom Government are at the cutting edge of that ambition.

Regarding the issue of justice and home affairs, our view is that there is now a genuine respect in the European Union for what one would call the common law tradition. The United Kingdom, Ireland, Cyprus and Malta primarily form what is called the common law club, but there is a real respect and sensitivity to the common law tradition and that is important.

In respect of economic migrants, countries already have flexibility. The United Kingdom, of course, chose one route in terms of openness of Labour markets on economic migrants. At that time, Sweden, the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom took one view and 22 other member states—I think that was the total—took a different view.

On agency workers, we think that our approach is right. The deal that we have come to with the CBI and TUC, which is now being agreed in Europe, is the right approach for the United Kingdom. It reflects the nature of the structure of the UK economy and the relative importance of temporary employment in the UK, notwithstanding the fact that the UK has a much lower level of temporary employment than many other EU member states that have signed up to a different version of a deal on agency workers.

Regarding regulation of the financial markets, I apologise again to the hon. Member for Aylesbury for my earlier intervention from a sedentary position; I was aiming to be helpful, rather than to show poor manners, by saying that what we are talking about is transparency. Transparency is really what we are talking about, both in global markets and in European markets, and we would do nothing that would jeopardise the competitive advantage of the City of London. We are not interested in doing that—it is not a conversation that we will get involved in—but it is important that we have transparency.

Finally, a small number of technical points were raised and I will just address one. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton asked about shared partnerships; I am surprised that he is uncharacteristically under-briefed, as I read out my brief to him. Shared partnerships is about the single market review and about using a wider range of policy tools; it is a non-legislative approach to modernise the single market, based on consultation with business and member states, and it is also about improving administrative capacity and co-operation, and building on synergies and taking, as I say, a non-legislative approach where that is possible. I am delighted to remind the hon. Gentleman that that is the working definition of shared partnerships.

With that, I would like to thank hon. Members for their participation in today's debate. We have had a thoughtful debate, free from the usual, tiresome rehearsal of clichés and point-scoring. As a consequence, we have had a relatively much more informed debate and I thank all hon. Members for that and also, of course, you yourself, Mr. Bayley, for presiding over our proceedings today.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 17 June 2008

[DAVID TAYLOR in the Chair]

Helmand Province

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Blizzard.]

9.30 am

Mr. Adam Holloway (Gravesham) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Taylor. I thank Mr. Speaker for allowing this important debate. Britain is at war, and we have spent too little time discussing and scrutinising what the Government are up to. I also thank the Minister and his team.

I start by paying tribute to our troops who have died in Afghanistan, their families, the injured and those who remain in the Helmand desert.

On 11 September 2001, the west had the sympathy of the vast majority of people in the Muslim world, who were against attacks carried out by a load of nihilist extremists. In the days following those attacks, western Governments—including our own—realised the enormity of the problem that we faced and within months had successfully defeated the Taliban and expelled al-Qaeda from its operating base there. Afghans literally danced in the streets in gratitude for their release from a mediaeval regime and from their hated Arab guests. At that point, there was a massive opportunity to make progress and good will on the part of the Afghan people to accept foreign aid and development. Although General McColl managed to get a tiny £2 million for development from the Department for International Development, the reality in Whitehall was that we were not concentrating on Afghanistan or more generally on al-Qaeda. Instead, we were focusing on a crazy and quite unnecessary invasion of Iraq.

Despite our early success in toppling the Taliban, almost everything we did afterwards undermined the massive amount of good will we had across the Muslim world after 9/11. Today, al-Qaeda are no longer seen as a bunch of extremist crazies; they are, to some extent, seen as heroes fighting against what they perceive to be an arrogant west. I fully accept that—with the possible exception of Iraq—our Government have acted in good faith and realised the seriousness of our situation, but I also believe the way we have executed this operation has been incompetent and half-cocked.

An awful expression that does the rounds in Whitehall these days is, "We are where we are". So, where are we now in Helmand province? There are 102 British dead and hundreds have been grievously wounded, many of whom would be dead were it not for modern protective equipment. That is why so many people survive but lose limbs. No one knows how many Afghan civilians have been killed and some say that 7,000 Taliban are dead. We should remember that those people are mostly local people with extended families. The Taliban's in-country command and control is in bits and we have killed many of their experienced commanders and tribal leaders. We might think that that is a good thing, but a newer, younger, more radical group of leaders might be emerging who are less likely to negotiate. That means we are facing more asymmetric attacks.

Despite gigantic spending by the UK, minute amounts of reconstruction have taken place. Last year, there were only 57 doctors in Helmand for a population of more than 1 million people. We have been there for three years, so that has happened on our watch.

Where is the security? To the Afghan population, the most visible sign of the Afghan Government is the Afghan national police. We must do more to get the police under control, because at the moment we are not doing anywhere near enough. The roads and security infrastructure that we have built are often used to make it easier for the police to rob people. The other day, I spoke to an interpreter I used 18 months ago in Lashkar Gah: he told me that a teenager was recently abducted from his small settlement and returned in the most awful physical condition, having been repeatedly raped over three days.

Although the UK has taken the lead on narcotics, heroin production has massively increased. Many millions of small arms, well over 30,000 artillery rounds and probably 100,000 Apache rounds have been fired, but to what effect? I have not been to Helmand for more than a year, but I think I am the only person in the House who has been to Helmand outside the Ministry of Defence, Foreign Office and DFID envelope. I have been there a couple of times at my own expense to talk to and spend time with ordinary Afghans. Before we arrived in 2006, Helmand was a pretty quiet place. There were 40 US troops in the base at Lashkar Gah, and at that time I wandered around the town and asked people whether they welcomed the arrival of the British. They said, "If the British bring security and reconstruction, they are welcome, but if you cannot bring peace and development, you should go home."

The Afghans themselves will decide who wins in Helmand and whether that will be the corrupt and frankly remote Afghan Government backed by the international community or the Taliban. It is incredibly important to focus on the needs of the ordinary Afghan, because the consent of the people is, in military terms, our vital ground. Three years after the arrival of UK forces, the Afghan civilian population can quite reasonably be disappointed. We still have their consent, but it has declined rapidly and markedly in the past three years. The Afghan people do not want the Taliban back, but that does not mean they will support us.

On the military, when Colonels Worsley and Messenger were busy setting up the provincial reconstruction team and Camp Bastion, others were busy—mainly in Kandahar—writing a joint plan for Helmand province. When 3 Para and Stuart Tootal arrived they were accompanied by a huge logistical chain. People were pretty confident that there would be enough troops to secure the area around Lashkar Gah and implement the plan—the ink-spot strategy—whereby development could take place and reconstruction would slowly spread across the province.

General Omar Bradley said that amateurs talk tactics, but professionals talk logistics. At the weekend, a modern British general said to me that he would change that comment: he would say that professionals talk command and control. That was a problem we faced in summer 2006, when there was a massive deviation from what sounded like a pretty reasonable plan. That deviation has set the whole tone for Helmand ever since and has resulted in massive violence. Partly because of that, reconstruction and development have been minuscule.

[Mr. Adam Holloway]

In summer 2006, we found ourselves with an extremely confused command and control structure. There was the Government here, the chiefs of staff, the NATO command chain, a Canadian brigadier general in charge in Kandahar, a British 3-star in Kabul, a commander of the Helmand taskforce, and the commander of the British forces—the brigade commander for the Paras, who was in an ill-defined and difficult position. At the same time, there were a load of Afghan district governors around Helmand, the governor of Helmand himself, and President Karzai. Those were all conflicting interest groups.

The result of the lack of clear command and control was the decision to dump the Afghan development zone plan and move relatively small numbers of troops to remote locations in the Government district centres in northern Helmand. That turned what should have been a slowly spreading ink-spot strategy into a violently flicked ink splatter. The result of what is now known as the platoon house strategy has been the deaths of dozens of British servicemen and hundreds of civilians.

Inevitably, any thought of development was a low priority when the British were dealing with that very difficult military situation. At the time and since, a number of British officers have complained that although there were things that they could have been doing in those areas, they simply did not have the budget to do them. The number of troops that we had in the new situation was just too low to make them anything more than self-defending targets for the Taliban. Thousands of refugees were created, and the towns sustained large amounts of damage and ceased to function properly. That was hardly the security and reconstruction that the Afghan population had expected.

Later, the military realised that after the platoon house strategy, there was an urgent need to get on with the hearts and minds effort. That was an unintended consequence of the platoon houses. Perhaps not unreasonably, the civilian agencies, including DFID, considered development activity far too dangerous because of the violence. Over time, that has become a problem, born of the military's view, which is still held, that the civilian effort in Helmand, particularly that of DFID, has failed them.

What of DFID? Even if the military had stayed with the plan and got everything right, there would still have been the difficulty that military personnel could never on their own solve the problem. NATO and our Government understand that all that the military can do is to provide the secure environment in which other things can happen and take effect. We talk an awful lot about the comprehensive approach—security, governance and reconstruction—and it sounds great, but a villager in Helmand could be forgiven for asking where that is and what the British were talking about.

Where is the reconstruction in Helmand? The British effort falls largely to DFID, but that is not an organisation charged with supporting the military effect. It likes to remind us that it is charged by law with the higher purpose of poverty reduction. Its whole philosophy and method of operation means that it is simply not geared to support military operations. As one senior officer put it,

"the military secure areas, but the civilians are way behind the military effort... we are lagging behind the rhetoric.... The problem is that DFID do not see themselves as part of our foreign policy."

That statement came this weekend from a very senior serving general. People can wag their heads, but that is the truth; it was said by a 3-star or 4-star general this weekend.

DFID believes that the best way to help a country is to support it with long-term initiatives. As one senior DFID official put it to a friend of mine,

"we don't do bricks and mortar".

DFID is not there for such initiatives; instead, it wants to undertake long-term projects working with Government Ministries. That is fine in theory, but in Helmand we do not have the time for that. DFID is simply not configured to do what the major on the ground needs to be done before, during or after military operations. It is not configured to help that major to regain hearts and minds.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): My hon. Friend is making a compelling case. Does he agree that there is a sad degree of repetition in this debate? Just a few years ago, when we had the debates on the invasion of Iraq, we were repeatedly assured that DFID would be there, just behind the armed forces, and that reconstruction would take place in Iraq. Is it not sad to hear exactly the same story about what is taking place in another country a few years later?

Mr. Holloway: Of course it is a tragedy, but as I will go on to say, we cannot blame the DFID staff for it. The problem is systemic.

Mr. Brazier: It is the Government.

Mr. Holloway: Indeed. To follow on from what my hon. Friend says, it was under huge pressure that DFID put people into the provincial reconstruction team in Lashkar Gah, but since they arrived there, they have found it hard to leave the compound. When they do it is mainly to visit the provincial capital, where the PRT sits. According to another friend of mine, many projects are evaluated on the basis of digital photographs taken by the military. According to a parliamentary answer, the cost of keeping an official in Helmand is £250,000 a year. Of course, a large component of that is security. I accept that some of the work is highly impressive—it ought to be, given the money that is spent. I also accept the commitment of DFID staff, who try to do the right thing.

Another very experienced person I spoke to, who is not entirely unknown to the FCO's payroll, said,

"DFID only do things in Helmand under duress."

Someone else, who is well known to DFID staff in Afghanistan, described their working arrangements as "ludicrous, completely ludicrous", as they work six weeks on, two weeks off.

"The cumulative impact is terrible. They come back from leave and spend the first two weeks catching up. They will also probably find themselves having to do the job of someone who is away on leave at the same time. They might then be able to spend a couple of weeks focusing on the job—then they are getting ready to go away again, to hand over to others without a grasp of the brief. All this in a country where trust and personal relations are incredibly important when dealing with Afghans. And then they are only generally in country for nine months all in."

I should like to hear later whether the Minister agrees with that assessment and that the working pattern should be changed.

The Minister has had a team of people working on this debate, and I am sure that when he speaks he will list all the wonderful achievements of DFID in Helmand, but unfortunately many people, certainly in the military, would not agree. Anyway, even if we have carried out a gazillion projects successfully in Helmand, what does that really matter if ordinary Afghans do not feel that we have made a difference to their lives?

A friend of mine recently turned down a job working in the PRT. She said that there was no point in going there because she did not feel that she would be able to achieve anything. She said:

"The bottom line is that we need to change. We need to accept more risks in terms of what we do, where we go."

I think that DFID is sending or has sent about 40 new people to reinforce the civilian effort. It will be interesting to see whether that large influx of people makes a difference. I hope that it does, but I do not know. It may be too late.

Why have we not pumped money into the Afghan and international non-governmental organisations that do exist? Why have we not stepped up the cash-for-work schemes? Why have we not made more use of the local village shuras and got stuff in at ground level? What about the national development programme or the unused capacity of the Bangladeshi charity? Perhaps that is why the Minister is going to Bangladesh later today; I do not know. The Central Asia Development Group has just finished a major project for USAID—the United States Agency for International Development—and has bags of capacity right across the province; why are we not paying it to do some of the work? Why are we not using private companies that will take the risk? I am talking not about men with gun trucks, but about people who can get out a little further. They can be directed by DFID staff inside the PRT. The Germans are doing very well in this respect. Why can we not try to persuade the Germans to get down there and do some of the work? I hope that the Minister will have some answers to these questions.

The new brigade commander in Helmand, the razor-sharp and remarkable Mark Carleton-Smith, went out to Helmand a few months ago, determined to change the focus from dealing with the Taliban to dealing with the needs of the Afghan people. I have no idea whether his initiative is responsible, but I have the feeling that a shake-up is going on in Whitehall on precisely this question of what we do with the civilian effect. Unlike the Minister, I do not have chapter and verse on what DFID has been doing in those years, but I do know that a shake-up is taking place. I shall give the House a taste of it.

For example, the Prime Minister's delivery unit is reviewing public service agreements on conflicts and reporting to permanent secretaries. A stabilisation and civil effect review has been set up by the Cabinet Office, and the taskforce will report to permanent secretaries on 1 July and to Ministers in September. A couple of things that have been a particular focus for them are specific questions on staffing in the Helmand PRT and risk management for personnel, and the feasibility of producing a framework that incorporates the FCO and the MOD. I would like to hear the Minister's view of that. The Government are also considering setting up a civilian reserve corps, and a cross-Government capacity for interpretation and translation.

I do not complain that the Government seem at last to have woken up to the fact that there are problems. I do not complain that new staff are heading out there. I do not complain about DFID staff, or that the Government have belatedly sent one their most able people—Hugh Powell—to Lashkar Gah. That was long overdue. However, I complain bitterly on behalf of our troops sitting in the Helmand desert, in the green zone and in remote locations, and I complain bitterly on behalf of the Afghan civilian population, who had such high hopes of us.

I wonder what on earth the Government have been doing. The Defence and International Development Committees go out there regularly. Every time we are given the same good news story, but it is not reflected on the ground. It is like smoke and mirrors, with everyone lying and deluding themselves. That is certainly how it feels from my perspective. As one Government employee put it to me yesterday:

"We realise it is now time to start taking it seriously".

It is bad enough that, on the home front, money is wasted and spin machines come into action, and that ideas are not executed properly or were half-cocked in the first place. The Government saw great opportunities and important things that needed to be done, such as spending more money on the NHS and health and the new deal, and they won that argument massively. But the problem is that the same arts used when confronting failure here are also applied to Helmand province, and I am sorry to say that the matter is too serious for that.

It may be against Conservative party policy, but I believe that it is time for DFID to come back under the control of the Foreign Office, becoming once again an arm of British foreign policy. The lessons of history tell us that we need unity of command for counter-insurgency. The NATO set-up lacks coherence, and even in Britain people have often not been conducting a single policy. It is time to adopt the Templar model from Malaysia. We need an overarching boss to be in charge, and a committee system. Even in Whitehall, no one is in charge. It could be argued that we have Cabinet Government. Fine, but where is the War Cabinet? As I shall say later, this policy has potentially catastrophic effects for people in Britain.

Let us not kid ourselves. We have been there for three years, but an awful lot of people in Helmand are disappointed, and some of them are pretty angry with us. One of our commanders described it as a "declining glide path of consent".

It is like an aeroplane, but we need to watch out or the plane will land. Does the Minister agree?

What should we do? I have focused on Helmand province, but I fully acknowledge that the picture is not gloomy everywhere, that large areas of Afghanistan are at relative peace and that reconstruction development is taking place. However, I guess we should expect that, given the hundreds of billions dollars of taxpayers' money from across the world being spent there.

[Mr. Holloway]

I want to shoot a sacred cow. Whenever people talk about Afghanistan, they say, "It is vital that we remain in Afghanistan; we are there to stop al-Qaeda regrouping and returning to threaten us." That is nonsense on several fronts. First, the effects of our over-ambitious and ill-resourced plan has been further to radicalise large numbers of people across the Muslim world.

We often talk about al-Qaeda and the Taliban as if they are the same thing. There is a significant difference. The Taliban are largely Pathan tribesmen with a traditional and nationalist agenda and no foreign policy. On the other hand, al-Qaeda is a loose international nihilist movement with a highly developed foreign policy and the intent, and, regrettably, sometimes the capability, to conduct mass casualty attacks across the globe. They are two completely different things.

Mullah Omar himself is reported in the late '90s to have been perturbed at the internationalist agenda of the Arabs that Abdul Haq had invited into the country earlier. Indeed, in 1998 Prince Turki, the internal security Minister for Saudi Arabia and later the Saudi ambassador to London, landed his jet at Kandahar in order to take bin Laden away. Mullah Omar was going to hand him over. Only after a shura to discuss the matter was it decided that they would not hand him over. Some people who know these things better than I do swear blind, although it is surprising to me, with my western point of view, that the only reason why Mullah Omar and the shura decided to let bin Laden stay was the pashtunwali code under which guests are protected.

To assert boldly that al-Qaeda will return to Afghanistan in a meaningful way is almost ridiculous. It is not the same situation as in the 1990s, when we ignored the place. Whatever we do in future, we shall still have an interest there. Since the 1990s, we have had huge signals intelligence, with huge overhead assets and loitering military assets in the sky. Almost every square centimetre of the country has been mapped. If they began to return—I cannot believe that the Afghans would wish to wreak the same disaster on themselves as happened in 2003—we would be able to deal with them.

While we pour life and resources into Afghanistan, that contributes to al-Qaeda successes in the Pashtun tribal belt in Pakistan itself. Pakistan is important to the United Kingdom, as many of our citizens have one foot in there and one in the UK. It is helping radicalisation in the "-stans", in the Maghreb, in east Africa and across the towns and cities of the Muslim world, including some of our own cities.

The trouble is that by making the link between al-Qaeda and nationalist causes around the globe, we help al-Qaeda. Last week, at a Conservative middle east council event, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) made the following observation, although he was not directly referring to Afghanistan. He said that we need to understand that

"we're not engaged in a single struggle against a single protagonist. We're not engaged in a clash of civilisations, and suggestions that we are can too easily have the opposite effect to the one that you intend—it makes extremists more attractive to the uncommitted. Yes of course there are connections between terrorist activity in different parts of the world, but we have be to a little smarter in how we handle those connections. Our aim should be to dismantle the processes, separating each component part rather than just sort of amalgamating them into a single global jihad that just becomes a call to arms."

I totally agree with my right hon. Friend.

We need a realistic long-term policy for Afghanistan. Does anyone seriously believe that Britain and the west will be able to continue with this relatively large-scale loss of life and spending billions and billions of pounds for many years to come? I cannot see it happening. We know that some NATO countries are wobbling because of the cost and the lives lost. It is time to scale down from what we would like to do to what we are able to do.

I do not pretend to be a great expert, but I have spoken to a lot of people who are—I am talking about people who have been there for longer than a six-month or nine-month tour, or through the changeover and reshuffles and so on. The consensus among them is something like this: we need to accept that large numbers of people in Helmand province are deeply traditional, xenophobic and resistant to change, and that most Afghans hate the Feringhi—the foreigner—especially if they pitch up in armoured vehicles and attack-helicopters. We cannot impose democracy at the point of a gun, so we need to play the great game in a new century and urgently bring the Taliban into the process with a national programme of local arrangements for different areas.

To the Government's credit, some of that is happening behind the scenes and through various other initiatives that I shall not raise now. However, such a strategy should be brought centre stage, regardless, frankly, of what President Karzai says. We need a sort of "You leave us alone, we'll leave you alone" approach and a bit of pragmatism. At the same time, we need to support intensively development zones and areas of the country that are at relative peace, reduce troop numbers to those that can be supported in the long term and focus our efforts massively on training the Afghan army and police.

I am not saying that we should disengage militarily. We should have small groups of troops on the ground, working with the Afghans; but it must be their show, and we must accept that it might not be very pretty. We should also be ready, at the drop of a hat, to send in helicopter-borne men with unseasonal suntans at dead of night, and to use missiles or bombs or whatever else at the slightest whiff of resurgent al-Qaeda.

It is time to stop seeing the Afghan Government as the key channel of development. We need development at local level and to let people locally decide what they want. We should let them start to feel some benefit from the presence of all those foreigners in their provinces. I am sorry to say this, and it may not be popular, but important aspirations such as women's rights and opium production will just have to wait until the reality on the ground catches up. We are there either to fight and defeat an insurgency and reduce poverty or we are not. In short, it is time to get a little bit of peace through reality—we could describe it as the great game crossed with ballistic missile, submarine and special-forces diplomacy, underwritten by massive development spending.

Mr. Brazier: My hon. Friend's speech is most compelling, but surely the point about the great game was that, again and again, we found ourselves fighting Pashtun tribesmen who were sheltering, because of the rules of hospitality to which he referred, the most repulsive Deobandi extremists, who came mostly from the centres of the big cities of India. I agree with most of the things that he has said, but we must surely recognise that the country's structure and remoteness makes it an ideal base for similar extremist insurgents to shelter, on the back of those historical rules of hospitality.

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. Interventions should be brief.

Mr. Holloway: What my hon. Friend said is superficially true, but there is a big difference now from the situation 150 years ago. Our intelligence picture is likely to be considerably better and we will have something resembling an Afghan state. We are making a big mistake in the so-called war on terror—I would love to think of a different name because that is not apt. There are lots of broadly nationalist movements in the middle east and we make our problems worse because we lump them together with the super-extremists. We must start to separate al-Qaeda from the Taliban and other nationalist movements in the region. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney suggested, although not directly vis-à-vis Afghanistan, we must dismantle the problems one by one. Take, for example, the Israel-Palestine problem. The Government, massively to their credit, have realised that it is one of the big games in town. We must pursue that approach, because until we get rid of those problems and separate them, al-Qaeda will mix in like those Indian troublemakers in the Pathan tribal belt all those years ago.

That neatly leads me back to the wider picture. I spoke at the beginning of my speech about the drivers of radicalisation. Three years ago, no one outside Helmand had heard of places such as Sangin, Gereshk, Nowzad and Musa Qala. Today, they are clearly on the map and internet sites of the global jihad. I again assert that we are in Afghanistan for well-intentioned reasons, but how does the Minister think that TV news footage of war fighting plays among impressionable Muslims even in this country?

The primary purpose of going to war in Afghanistan was to deny al-Qaeda a safe operating base. We achieved that aim a long time ago. Our secondary objective was the destruction of the Taliban. However, frankly—let us have some realpolitik—that appears to be beyond our means. Commanders can tell us that we are winning until they are blue in the face, and that increasing numbers of suicide and roadside bombings prove that, but, at some point, as in every other insurgency historically, we will have to make a deal with the Taliban. I have some sympathy with the argument that we must beat them to some extent and make them realise that they cannot win before we can make such a deal. Does the Minister agree that now is the time for a deal?

The big strategic challenge for our generation is to win back the good will of all those people who were with us on 11 September 2001. We must do that over the next six months, or over 10 or 30 years. We must take al-Qaeda back to where it was, in terms of popular support across the world, in 2001, which was frankly nowhere. At the same time, in parallel, we must reduce its residual capacity.

What we have been doing in Afghanistan is a long-term liability for the UK. It has been ill thought out and is counter-productive, and it is a further driver of radicalisation around the world and in this country, all of which contribute to our wider strategic failure.

We have lost immeasurable amounts of good will since 11 September 2001 and it continues to haemorrhage away across the Muslim world and Pakistan in particular. It is time to free up resources to deal with the much more serious strategic threats that we will face in the coming months and decades. We need to win back that good will and fight the battles that really matter. When we do those things, we might be doing something to make our people safer.

10.9 am

Willie Rennie (Dunfermline and West Fife) (LD): I am not quite sure how to follow that excellent contribution, which was rather colourful in places. Nor am I sure whom the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Holloway) was referring to when he mentioned helicopters and unseasonable suntans in the middle of the night, but he certainly added colour to our proceedings.

It feels like the old gang are back together because the hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) and I visited Afghanistan together as members of the Select Committee on Defence. Thanks to the Pakistan air force, however, I never actually made it to Helmand—that was not because of a clash between the Governments of Pakistan and Afghanistan, or because of a war of words, but simply because an innocent prawn cocktail made sure that I stayed in the base in Kabul. I was disappointed not to have made it down to the south to see the provincial reconstruction teams for myself and hear from the troops about their experiences of development work.

As he has shown this morning, the hon. Member for Gravesham has extensive knowledge of Afghanistan and Helmand. He is probably the only Member of Parliament to have visited the country using his own means and to have heard about the situation in the south for himself—without spin and without being influenced by Government officials. I do not necessarily agree with all his analysis and I do not claim to be as knowledgeable as him—I simply go on the information and advice that I receive from various reports—but I am not as pessimistic as him. Excellent work is being done, although there are challenges.

The Liberal Democrats support the mission in Afghanistan, although we recognise that we should not use the grand rhetoric that Ministers have unfortunately used about it, including in the past week. The task ahead is extremely hard. We should not always talk about democracy and human rights in Afghanistan in terms of British standards, and although we should always strive to achieve the best, we should be realistic about what we can achieve.

One of my main criticisms is that we took our eye of the ball in Afghanistan when we invaded Iraq. The efforts of the great minds in the Department for International Development, the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign Office were primarily focused on Iraq. Massive numbers of troops were in Iraq at the time, but that was exactly when we should have been investing in reconstruction in Afghanistan, particularly in the south. We should not have started investing five years later, when we had already started to lose the hearts and minds of people in the south.

[Willie Rennie]

None the less, the Liberal Democrats support and completely agree with the comprehensive strategy that the Prime Minister set out at the end of last year. There are issues about implementation, but we agree overall with the strategy, which takes a sensible approach.

Distinguishing between the different players in the south of Afghanistan—whether they are Taliban, al-Qaeda, Pashtun or tribal leaders—is difficult. That is why we need the professionals and the military on the ground to determine who is what. People will shift between the different categories at different times, but we sometimes look at these issues far too simplistically. I agree that we should be more sophisticated in our approach to identifying who is hostile and who is not. We should leave it to those on the ground to determine such things. Sometimes we will think that people are friendly, but they will suddenly become hostile again because they fear that those who are hostile will be stronger than those in our military. The answer is to use the military and the professionals on the ground to make the judgments. Foreign Office officials recently got into difficulties when they were negotiating with individuals in the south. President Karzai did not appreciate the fact that they had gone beyond what he thought was their remit. These are difficult issues, and we must be intelligent in our approach.

The Minister might be aware of the Oxfam report "Afghanistan: Development and Humanitarian Priorities", which was published in January. Oxfam has been very critical of the humanitarian and development effort. In the summary at the beginning of its report, it says:

> "While aid has contributed to progress in Afghanistan, especially in social and economic infrastructure—and whilst more aid is needed—the development process has to date been too centralised, top-heavy and insufficient. It is has been prescriptive and supply-driven, rather than indigenous and responding to Afghan needs", which is very much what the hon. Member for Gravesham said.

The report covers a huge range of issues. I do not necessarily agree with the tone of some aspects of it, but it is pretty comprehensive. It covers aid effectiveness, governance, agriculture, counter-narcotics, education, health, the protection of non-governmental organisations, community peace building, regional action and the provincial reconstruction teams, and I want to spend quite a bit of time discussing how effective the PRTs have been. However, the main criticism in the report is that the Afghans have been fed a diet of development over which they have had little say, that has been delivered by outsiders and is not good value for money. Before I look at that, however, I want to discuss how much of the aid pledged by foreign Governments has been delivered.

Since 2001, $25 billion of aid has been committed, but only $15 billion has been delivered. I am aware that more money was committed at last week's conference, but I am not sure how much of it was new money and how much has been delivered already—only time will tell which category it falls into. According to the Agency Coordinating Body for Afghan Relief—an alliance of international aid agencies working in Afghanistan, of which the Minister will probably be aware—the US is the worst offender, having delivered only $5 billion of the $10 billion that it has committed. We should be generous to the US because it has committed considerable sums—much more than any other individual country—but there is a difference between pledging and committing. The UK, Canada, Italy and Japan have a good record of delivering on their pledges, but there is still a $10 billion shortfall overall compared with the amount pledged. The UK has a £200 million shortfall for 2002-08. Why has that money not been spent? What, in general, is the Minister's response to the report?

Another issue picked up by the Oxfam report relates to value for money and local delivery. Large chunks of the aid that is actually delivered flow back out of the country simply because we use external contractors, advisers and consultants, rather than indigenous support. According to the Oxfam report, about 40 per cent. of the money spent by the donor countries, including the US and the UK, goes into corporate profits, consultants' salaries and other costs. That vastly pushes up the cost of projects, so we get less for the money that we spend.

For example, a road between the centre of Kabul and the international airport cost the US $2.3 million per kilometre, which is at least four times the average cost to the Afghan authorities of building a road. To take another example, a classroom costs $14,000 when built by the Afghan Government, $17,000 when built by NATO, $21,500 when built by a private contractor and a staggering $51,000 when built by an international developer. I am sure that there are sometimes reasons why it is appropriate to use an international developer, but I would hope that this is an extreme case and that such things are not common. My fear, however, is that they are. Perhaps it is far too easy to opt for an international developer.

I appreciate that DFID has a good track record of trying to filter money through Afghan institutions, including the Afghanistan reconstruction trust fund, but US aid is bypassing the Afghan civilian Government. What discussions have our Government had with the US Government to spread the lessons learned from DFID's good practice and to allow the United States to benefit from our knowledge? It is important that Afghans see the money being spent wisely, but it is also important to us to ensure value for money. What monitoring measures are in place to ensure that?

There are about 25 provincial reconstruction teams, led by 13 different nations, and standards and operating practices for each PRT are an issue. Although we do not want complete uniformity, we want some consistency among the PRTs and a general working practice. According to their mission statement, PRTs should > "assist the Government of Afghanistan to extend its authority, in order to facilitate the development of a stable and secure environment in the identified area of operations, and enable Security Sector Reform and reconstruction efforts".

However, the handbook also says that there should be an interim structure.

Oxfam has criticised the PRTs for going well beyond their remit at the expense of the development of local Afghan institutions and Government structures. Rather than a help, the PRTs could be seen as a hindrance. Whether to use PRTs and quick improvement projects to ensure early delivery is a dilemma. Making immediate improvements to the quality of life in an area demonstrates to the individuals living there the clear benefits for their families of having the British military on site. But if we are trying to build up Afghan institutions, we must sometimes wait, but how long should we wait before institutions are ready to deliver their own reconstruction? Developing their skills and capabilities helps the Afghan Government to gain authority in the regions. That is another part of the parcel.

Security is obviously important. Members might be aware of the story of two Afghan decorators who were hired to spruce up a local school in Musa Qala. Refreshing the rather untidy and unkempt school was supposed to be a good-will gesture to the local community, but during the decorators' 50-mile trip back to their house after completing the task, their convoy was ambushed. The Taliban discovered that they had been working for the British, and they were promptly hanged.

In that climate, why would any citizen of Afghanistan want to help the British? Their security is not personally guaranteed, and locals are not absolutely convinced that the British will stay there for a long time. In Musa Qala, for instance, we had control and then lost it, and now we are back in. How many Afghans in Musa Qala believe that the British will be there for the long run, and wonder how long it will be before the Taliban come back? Why would they help in those circumstances? I understand the difficulties of trying to build up local structures and local capability for reconstruction, but in that climate—again, I depart from the hon. Member for Gravesham on this point—it is perhaps no surprise that outside agencies are reluctant to enter zones where even the security of Afghanistan's own citizens is not guaranteed. Again, that is a matter for the professionals on the ground.

It has been asked whether we are too risk-averse. Are we sending the appropriate individuals to such areas to help with indigenous reconstruction? Are we being too timid in our approach? A risk assessment needs to be done. It is not for us to make that decision in this Chamber—it must be made by those on the ground with an understanding of security and safety—but it is a problem. Indigenous reconstruction is not happening at the pace that Oxfam and others would like.

Oxfam says that we should restrict the use of PRTs to situations in which they are absolutely necessary, and the security situation prevents other development. Those are the parameters for risk assessment. The Select Committee on International Development found in its report on Afghanistan:

> "If the goal of the international effort is to build up Afghan capacity, PRTs should not perform functions which could be performed by Government of Afghanistan structures."

I think that everybody would agree with that, but exactly when does that happen? When is it safe to allow external bodies to come in and help with a reconstruction effort that is primarily indigenous? That is a decision for the commanders and professionals on the ground.

Concerns have been expressed about the lack of funds flowing through to the military when the conditions—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to draw his remarks to a close in order to give the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman and the Minister time to reply.

Willie Rennie: Certainly, Mr. Taylor. I am coming to the end of my speech.

There are questions whether funds are flowing through to the military at the appropriate time. Concerns have been expressed that the military do not receive funds when it is absolutely clear that they should in order to complete quick improvement projects, because DFID believes that such reconstruction projects should be conducted by locals.

I have two other points to raise. One concerns police training. We heard from the Defence Secretary yesterday about the progress that has been made on police training. The Government believe that the new format of focused district development is reforming and reconstructing the police forces. I would like to hear what the magic bullet is, because it has been difficult to get the police forces on side in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The other issue is the poppy crop. Concerns have been expressed about the expansion of the poppy crop, but we hear that it is declining this year. Is that due to food prices, or is it a result of some substantial change in the security situation that has allowed farmers to adopt alternative livelihoods?

10.27 am

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie), who made an excellent speech. He covered some of the ground that I was going to cover, so I shall not. I thought that he got it absolutely right when he highlighted some of the problems of building capacity in the provinces, and I intend to touch on that matter in my speech.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Holloway) on a thought-provoking speech, much of which I agreed with, although a couple of elements I did not. He is absolutely right to say that the Conservative party's official position is not to put DFID back under FCO control. To take his speech in the round, one of his key points, with which I agree absolutely, is that we need to start looking at the whole question of development in Helmand province from the viewpoint of the Afghan. That is simply not being done to the degree that it should be. We have talked about producing community development plans via community development councils—having spoken with some councillors on my trip there a couple of weeks ago, I shall talk about that—but the fact remains that we are still not Afghan-focused.

For my part, I have not travelled under my own steam in Afghanistan. I have travelled there with the Select Committee on Defence. I also served in Afghanistan for some weeks as a Royal Engineers major in charge of delivering reconstruction and development, so I got to see some of the work at first hand, and I went a couple of weeks ago to see the work of the stabilisation unit in Lashkar Gah. That trip was fascinating, and I shall discuss some of the points that came out of it in a few moments.

In the short time that I have, I shall discuss the role of the stabilisation unit, which my hon. Friend touched on. We in this place are always slightly suspicious when Departments change their name; it is not normally a good sign, so the fact that the post-conflict reconstruction unit magically became the stabilisation unit was a clear sign that perhaps not everything was going well. However, having been to see the stabilisation unit at work in

[Mr. Mark Lancaster]

Lashkar Gah, I was encouraged that finally—some would argue that it has taken far too long—we are getting on the right track. The comprehensive approach that my hon. Friend described—security, governance and reconstruction—finally seems to be coming together, and for the first time the UK has produced a UK road map for bringing together the military effect to ensure that it contributes directly to the development needs in Helmand province. We are beginning—painfully slowly—to see the positive benefits of that.

I recall during my time there visiting a PRT in Herat province, which was not experiencing the degree of conflict that Helmand was; we viewed it as the sort of province that we hoped Helmand would be in two or three years. However, I watched the Spanish military commander and the Spanish equivalent of DFID arguing over who was supporting whom and who was in control, which was a clear message that we needed to get the stabilisation unit right to try to put an end to that type of conflict between the military, DFID and the FCO. The one message that we were given—it seems to be quite genuine—is that the unit now has that under control and no longer are the military constantly arguing or vying with DFID over who is doing what and who is supporting whom. I was deeply encouraged by that. In addition, the PRT in Lashkar Gah is now commanded by an FCO official, not a military commander, so that conflict seems to have ended.

This debate is specifically about the military action in support of development, of which I have some experience, as I said, having been a Royal Engineer working briefly in Kandahar and Helmand. While in Helmand a couple of weeks ago, as I talked with some of my colleagues in the Royal Engineers, it became clear to me that great frustrations remain about the speed at which money gets to them for delivering projects that they are asked to undertake, as the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife explained—for example, road-building projects to connect the main towns of the Helmand valley.

Unfortunately, there still seems to be some rivalry over funding streams and who gets what money, and it has been argued that military support would be much greater if the process of getting money through were made faster. Indeed, yesterday in the House, I asked the Secretary of State for Defence that question, but he chose not to answer. As my hon. Friend rightly said, there is a gap between what we can realistically expect DFID operators to achieve in that difficult environment and what they ought to be achieving, given that we are entirely reliant on military engineers to deliver that effect. We have not quite managed to close that gap, but we are making progress. The gap is closing slowly, but until we close it entirely and can ensure a seamless transition, we must ensure that funding streams are available to both equally.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the police, who in any normal country are the first line in ensuring security and governance. It became pretty clear during our trip a couple of weeks ago that the police in Helmand do not have a good reputation. In fact, it was fascinating visiting the head of the counter-narcotics police, who claimed that almost every member of the normal police—if I can call them that—was a drug addict, permanently off their head on some form of drug and completely untrustworthy. They did not have the trust of the Afghan people. Clearly we must do an enormous amount of work in that area, because an effective police force is a key plank in delivering sustainable development in Helmand province.

My hon. Friend also spoke about finding alternative livelihoods for poppy farmers and argued that it might well have to wait until other things have been put in place. He may well be right. In fact, some would argue that very little progress has been made in that area since we have been there.

Mr. Holloway: I was not quite saying that. My point is that we desperately need alternative livelihoods to poppy farming, rather than to pick an argument with Afghan villagers by destroying their crops. Where are those alternative livelihoods?

Mr. Lancaster: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and he will be reassured by what we heard during our meeting with the new governor in Helmand, Governor Mangal. He has drawn up a five-year plan—I hate to call it that, because it conjures up images of Stalinist plans—offering a clear carrot-and-stick approach to poppy farmers. By ensuring that the infrastructure is in place so that goods can be brought to market, he intends in the next few years to offer real alternative livelihoods to try to wean poppy farmers off the need to grow poppies. We were quite encouraged by the plan's detail.

Clearly, as hon. Members have highlighted, building capacity is at the heart of what we need to do in Helmand province, and Afghanistan as a whole. From my humble experience of working in Afghanistan, I have no doubt that very good work is being done as a result of the majority of DFID's efforts in Kabul in attempting to build capacity in the national Government, although some Ministries are doing far better than others—as ever, the Ministry for Rural Reconstruction and Development seems to be pushing along very well. However, translating that capacity building down to provincial level, where local Afghans will actually see a difference, is proving to be much more challenging.

During our trip to Lashkar Gah, we met some of the local government officials from each of the Government Departments who have been charged with trying to build capacity locally. What we heard was not very encouraging. Some three years ago, when we first became involved in Helmand, about 200 schools were open in the province, but today there are just 56. That is a direct example of what my hon. Friend was saying: our intervention has, to a degree, had a detrimental effect. Yesterday, when I argued with the Secretary of State for Defence in the House, he denied that those facts were true, but it is what we are being told, not by DFID officials—although they were present at our meeting—but by Afghans charged with delivery.

Mr. Holloway: I agree with my hon. Friend. One of the big problems is that we do not hear any Afghan voices in much of what we do. In my limited experience, the reality experienced by Afghans—on the other side of the barbed wire—is very different from what we hear about when speaking to our officials. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say about that. It is also very different from what we are told by the media.

whose interest is very limited, although Sky News is now running a week-long series of programmes—not before time. We need much more scrutiny.

Mr. Lancaster: As ever, my hon. Friend makes a valuable point. When I returned to Lashkar Gah some 18 months after leaving, I was encouraged by the fact that we could get out, which we simply could not have done when he and I went with the Defence Committee. That in itself shows progress, so we should be encouraged. Let us be clear about that.

From talking with local tribesmen and members of community councils—the very people charged with coming up with the community development plans—it became clear to me that a bottom-up approach is being taken in an effort to understand what local tribesmen want, so hon. Members should be encouraged. However, progress is painfully slow, and we need to focus on where it will make the principal difference. I listened to what my hon. Friend said, and believe firmly that DFID should focus its efforts at the local and provincial levels.

Before the Minister responds to the debate, I should like to make one point about the counter-narcotics police, as that is another area in which the Government need to be a little cleverer about how they support local Afghan organisations. We went to see the head of the counter-narcotics police, who turned the air-conditioning on especially for us. They had so little diesel that they could not afford to run the air-conditioning or their local trucks. They had been funded directly by the British Government, but an artificial timeline had been set so that, from the end of March, all the funding that had come directly from the British Government stopped.

We had decided that, by that time, the necessary infrastructure and capacity would have been built up within the relevant Ministry—the Ministry of Justice, I think—and the Afghan Government, so the money was diverted to Kabul in the hope that it would filter down to the provinces and local commanders. However, capacity had not been built into the national system and the money was not coming through. All the sterling efforts of the local commander had gone to pot because he could not get the diesel through his own system, because our Government had decided, completely artificially, that 31 March was the date that funding would stop. That is a clear example of how we need to be a bit smarter when deciding how to help people in Helmand. Artificial deadlines are based on an assumption that capacity will have been built in the provinces, and that simply is not happening. We need to reconsider what is happening there, as that is only one of many examples of how we need to do better.

10.41 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Shahid Malik): It is a pleasure to engage in this debate under your stewardship, Mr. Taylor. I congratulate the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Holloway) on securing this important and timely debate, which has shown that Afghanistan is a country of extreme complexity that faces enormous challenges. We must not underestimate the scale of those challenges, but there has been genuine progress, to which the British armed forces and Her Majesty's Government have made a significant contribution.

It will be impossible to respond, in the time available, to all the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised. Time has flown; I had wondered whether there would be enough meat to keep the debate going for an hour and a half with just one or two speakers, but it could have lasted for four or five hours. I shall respond as quickly as possible, but my response will be slightly disjointed because I want to respond to the points that have been made.

I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman accepted that he does not know chapter and verse. At the risk of sounding slightly unkind, I must say that that was evident in part of his contribution.

Mr. Holloway: I thank the Minister for acknowledging that, but will he also acknowledge that senior people in the military have serious misgivings about DFID's performance?

Mr. Malik: I accept that Afghanistan is an extremely challenging place for all who are there trying to make it a better place for the people of the country.

It might be useful if I get straight into the meat of this debate. Following decades of conflict and political turmoil, Afghanistan is one of the poorest countries in the world and remains off track in relation to all the millennium development goals, but there has been real progress and life has improved for many Afghans. Let me illustrate some of the achievements since 2001. About 6 million children are in school, more than a third of whom are girls. That number is up from the estimated 1 million children who were in school in 2001, of whom very few were girls as they were officially denied access to education under the Taliban. The legal economy grew by 13.5 per cent. in 2007-08, and 82 per cent. of people now live in districts with access to basic health care, compared with just 9 per cent. in 2002.

Let us be under no illusions that building on those important gains will be easy. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said last week in Prime Minister's questions, we are in it for the long haul. Neither the Taliban nor illegally armed groups pose an immediate and credible threat to the overall authority of the Afghan Government, but in the south, in particular, security is fragile, which makes it difficult for Afghans to live and work in safety, and for aid workers to operate.

Mr. Lancaster: The figures that the Minister has given are for Afghanistan. Can he give us figures for education and health in Helmand?

Mr. Malik: I am coming to Helmand.

In Helmand, the impact of military operations is that they are setting the conditions for stabilisation, reconstruction and development to begin. The UK has invested heavily in joined-up civilian and military planning. As the hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) has rightly pointed out, we have a civilian-military plan for Helmand—the Helmand road map—which is backed by the stabilisation aid fund. Last week, a senior civil servant arrived to be the UK's new senior representative for Helmand.

To assist with integration and joined-up decision making, the provincial reconstruction team is located with the military headquarters of Task Force Helmand. Of course, success depends not only on an increasingly effective civil-military effect, but on the involvement of the Afghan Government and the Helmand governor. We must always remember that our aim is to help the Afghans to secure and govern Helmand and the wider country themselves, not to do that for them.

[Mr. Malik]

Over the life of the PRT, the scale and influence of civilian effort has increased significantly. It has evolved from the relatively narrow concept of backfilling military operations with reconstruction efforts to one of influencing the shape and conduct of military operations. Joined-up civilian-military planning has enabled the UK to shape and extend the reach of stabilisation activities beyond Lashkar Gah to Gereshk, Sangin and Musa Qala. Recent stabilisation efforts in Musa Qala demonstrate the progress in the UK's civil-military stabilisation operations and may provide a future model.

We do not have figures on education in Helmand, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that DFID funding in Helmand has helped with the construction of 44 km of road, the completion of 851 bore wells and contracts for another 974. It has also helped with the 496 community development councils that have been elected in six districts, which have received more than £5 million in grants for local development projects. In addition, 332 microfinance clients have received small loans to start new businesses in Helmand.

There have been positive moves forward with education in Helmand, including the recent opening of the main school, with 500 pupils and 30 teachers, and the establishment of basic municipal services. With our military operations setting the necessary security conditions, our civilians are promoting stabilisation, reconstruction and development. Since our engagement began in 2006, DFID has spent £23.7 million in Helmand out of a commitment of £30 million from 2006-07 to 2008-09, which has delivered many development gains such as those that I mentioned.

I shall cut out most of what I had intended to say so that I can get to the core of the questions that have been asked. We know that we have a long way to go before Afghanistan can become a safe, peaceful and prosperous nation. The international community and the UK have not got everything right, and there is always room for improvement.

I shall respond to some of the questions that the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie) asked. Some of his points were also made by the hon. Members for Gravesham and for North-East Milton Keynes. He was absolutely right about the battle for hearts and minds, and I think that we would all agree that that is where victory—if we can call it that—will be achieved. He was also correct that a simplistic approach, such as thinking of the groups involved as a homogenous mass, will not deliver results. There needs to be a more sophisticated approach, and we would like to think that that is exactly what we are moving towards through local empowerment and by moving down to local level.

I am pleased that DFID's £50 million funding for the national solidarity programme has helped to establish more than 20,000 local community development councils, which build on the model of the local shuras and ensure that local people receive funding.

Mr. Holloway: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Malik: For the last time.

Mr. Holloway: I am dismayed; we have heard all this before. This is the "good news only" stuff. When will the Government start answering the key questions: are we winning? What more do we need to do? How will we stop the rapid glide path in the consent for our being there? We have heard everything that the Minister is saying before.

Mr. Malik: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has heard it before, but that was not clear from his contribution, so for his sake perhaps I should repeat it.

There are 496 such councils in Helmand. DFID funding also goes to non-governmental organisations across the country, including in Helmand, through the Afghan Government. For example, the Bangladeshi NGO BRAC runs a microfinance programme in Helmand with DFID funding.

On the UK's commitments and pledges, I say to the hon. Gentleman that we have met our obligations. Our challenge is to ensure that others do likewise, and our mind is focused on that. The UK has spent all that it pledged at the London conference, in the time scale set out. Other donors have yet to honour their commitments, and that is where much of the challenge lies.

At the Paris conference last week, the Afghan Government repeatedly asked the international community to put donor funds through central Governments and not spend off budget. DFID leads on that, providing 80 per cent. of its funding through the ARTF. Many other donors do not, and we encourage them to do as the Afghans ask. That is part of our belief in a country-led approach.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife asked whether the price of wheat was having an impact on the poppy crop. There is certainly anecdotal evidence of farms in the south destroying some of their poppy crop to grow wheat, and land under poppy cultivation may have decreased. It is too early to give a definitive answer.

The hon. Gentleman was right to mention magic bullets, but he is wrong if he believes that there is one in the case of policing. We all wish that there were. On winning hearts and minds, it is interesting that President Karzai said in October 2007, during his visit to the UK, that there was a need for talks with elements of the insurgency, but only those that renounce violence against Afghanistan and the west, and that accept the Afghan constitution and are willing to live in peace. In December 2007, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that insurgencies were ultimately solved at political level, not by military means alone. I think that the hon. Gentleman would concur with that.

Since 2001, we have pledged or spent some £1.65 billion in Afghanistan, and I have described part of the impact of that. The hon. Member for Gravesham mentioned the issue of women, which is incredibly important. It was one of the factors that allowed many people to support military intervention in Afghanistan. Some 60 per cent. of women voted in the 2004 elections, and 27 per cent. of primary school-age girls are enrolled in schools in rural areas and 51 per cent. in urban areas. Some 2 million girls are now in primary schools in Afghanistan.

The hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes was well informed in many parts of his contribution. He is right that there are joint military and civilian planning arrangements in Helmand, which was true from the outset. I would add that civilians and the military are working much closer in Helmand. The provincial reconstruction team is led by a Foreign and Commonwealth Office civilian, who works closely with the military commander, and military engineers work where it is too dangerous for UK civilians or Afghan contractors to go.

Mr. Lancaster: I am listening to the Minister's argument that we are all working together closely in Helmand, but does he not understand that the fact that he was unable to tell us how many schools are open in Helmand is not encouraging? It does not give the impression that we have a grip on what is going on in Helmand.

Mr. Malik: It would be foolish to suggest that anybody has chapter and verse knowledge of everything in Afghanistan. The hon. Gentleman's point indicates some of the challenges that exist, particularly in Helmand. Nobody is underestimating those challenges.

Hon. Members mentioned the Afghan police. It is true that there is widespread evidence of corruption, poor leadership and a lack of capability in Afghanistan's police, which undoubtedly undermines the Afghan Government's credibility. That, in turn, leads to further decline in respect for the rule of law. However, there has been some progress on providing basic training to large numbers of police officers and on the close mentoring of specialist forces. Some 80,000 Afghan police have been trained and equipped. The UK is committed to improving the quality of policing in Afghanistan and has been active in lobbying partners to increase the training and mentoring of Afghan police. Along with Germany, we were instrumental in setting up the EU police mission to Afghanistan. In 2007-08, we contributed about £10 million, and 35 personnel have been deployed to assist with police development.

Mr. Holloway: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Malik: I do not think that I will, because time is against us.

As I have said, we know that we have a long way to go before Afghanistan can become a safe, peaceful and prosperous nation. The international community and the UK have not got everything right, and there is always room for improvement. For example, we accept that we have not been as successful as we could have been at persuading other donors—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. We must move on to the next debate.

Bee Industry

11 am

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Mr. Taylor, I am quite sure that, as the passions rise, you will contain us and keep us within the realm of behaviour that is becoming to this place. I thank my colleagues from all parts of the House for coming to this debate, because the future of the bee industry is one of the major issues in the country today as far as I am concerned.

I want to say something very quickly about the honey bee and why we are very interested in it. In 1973, Karl von Frisch won a Nobel prize in physiology and medicine for his pioneering work on comparative behavioural psychology and communication between bees. He was the first scientist really to discover how species of bees utilise sensory perception and he established the importance of their waggle dance for communication. I do not intend to demonstrate waggle dancing to everyone here today, but there are nine species of bees and nine varieties of the waggle dance.

Interestingly, as people will know there is a queen bee that looks after the hive while the worker bees waggle. However, the queen bee, like yourself Mr. Taylor, maintains a social order through the emission of pheromones. I guess, Mr. Taylor, that you never knew before how you maintained your dignity and command over this House. Foraging honey bees use the waggle dance, of course, to tell other honey bees at the back of the nest how far away and in which direction they will find the next source of nectar. As every schoolboy and schoolgirl knows, the bees go to collect the nectar and in so doing perform major functions, which I shall come on to shortly.

Researchers are now looking at how different bees communicate with each other. It has got to the stage that European bees can communicate with Asian bees, even though they are from different species. Asian bees learn the waggle rhythm that the European bees have manifested for many years, and they can communicate information about distances and so on. They also recalibrate the way that they fly by their waggle.

Bees can also sense chemicals. They can be trained to detect explosives, drugs and even chemical weapons. That is not generally known, but I know that the Pentagon has been working on this use of bees for some years now and the sight of bees swarming around white powder is quite a classic thing that happens in this country too. So there is hope that, in that area of detection, we may find another use for bees as research progresses.

Beekeeping and research into bees has been going on for some time. The bee is a fascinating creature and this week I shall go to see the Norfolk beekeepers at Easton college; I look forward to getting up close and personal with the beehives that they look after. Of course, right across the world people go out and see bees. Bees have this image about them that they only sting; I want to dispel that image completely. Of course, they sting and if one asks a classroom of young people what they know about bees, they will say, "Ooh, they sting you". However, when one asks the young people why they sting, they will reply, "Because we annoy them". Well, that is youth today, I suppose; annoying bees seems to be a habit. It might be worth an antisocial behaviour order in a certain repressive kind of regime, although not here, of course.

[Dr. Ian Gibson]

Massive winter losses of bee colonies in the USA and Canada of more than 60 per cent. have been attributed to what we call colony collapse disorder, or CCD. Similar problems are now developing in countries in Europe, for example Greece, where losses are pretty high, which makes beekeeping rather unsustainable. The causes of such dramatic losses are not yet really understood and research suggests that there are a combination of factors: the parasitic varroa mite; the virus that the mite vectors or carries; and nosema, a fungal infection. All these factors, together with some kind of stress disorder, may be forming the lethal cocktail that is destroying bee colonies.

The UK is beginning to experience similar problems. Notwithstanding the ravages of varroa, normal winter losses are between 5 and 10 per cent. of bees. However, in 2006 beekeepers reported mysterious losses over the winter of between 10 and 15 per cent. of bees; rather large numbers of bees were dying. There were similarities to CCD, but it is still not clear that it is exactly the same problem, because there are some differences from CCD.

The British Beekeepers' Association has done some sterling work in this area. Its study of the work of 10 per cent. of its 11,500 members revealed that the average loss of bees this winter was 30 per cent., which is three times the expected level. So, something is happening to honey bees across the world and it is now affecting bees in this country.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (UKIP): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on bringing this subject before the House. It is an important subject and he is being characteristically charming and informative in proceeding with the debate. I cannot wait for the second half of his speech.

I wonder if the hon. Gentleman recalls that, on 15 May 2008, in another place Lord Rooker stated in answer to a question:

> "There is no specific information on the impact that the large-scale loss of honey bees would have on the economy, although it could be significant." [Official Report, House of Lords, 15 May 2008; Vol. 701, c. 147WA.]

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that some sort of full cost estimate of the general impact on agriculture, food production and the economy of the demise of bees in this country would help to focus both the Government's attention and public attention on what is not a marginal but a major developing issue in this country?

Dr. Gibson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention; the answer, of course, is yes, and he is trying to steal my thunder because I am about to refer in more detail to what Lord Rooker told the other place, and to the effects on the economy.

The prospect of losing our local honey supplies is bad enough, and also sad, but a deeply worrying threat is the loss of our principal army of pollinators; that is the real issue. The demise of the honey bee would have a devastating impact on the pollination of crops across the world, but particularly in this country. There would be a major impact on the environment and wildlife, which depend on bees to pollinate fruits and seeds for their survival.

As the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) alluded to, Lord Rooker stated in the House of Lords last November that if we did not deal with the current and potential threats we could lose our honey bees in this country within 10 years. In the same exchange, he confirmed the important economic role of honey bees. Work done by a large independent provider of environmental consultancy and rural services in 2002, which was updated last year, indicated that pollination by honey bees contributes £165 million per annum to the agricultural economy of this country. That is probably a low estimate, because it is based on farm-gate prices. A sample of just 10 crops, including top fruits such as apples and pears, which depend for up to 90 per cent. of their pollination on bees, and soft fruits, which depend on bees for about 30 per cent. of their pollination, and of course the ubiquitous and industrially important oilseed rape, which depends for almost 10 per cent. of its pollination on bees, shows the importance of bees.

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): As a beekeeper myself, may I say to the hon. Gentleman that clearly there are important economic impacts from the collapse of beekeeping, but surely there is also a much wider environmental impact? It is not just cash crops, important as those are, that are affected. A wide variety of wild species up and down this country, which we take for granted at the moment, would, if deprived of honey bee pollination, go into rapid decline. That would have a tremendously negative impact on British ecology and wildlife, and on the environment that we take for granted.

Dr. Gibson: Yes, the honey bee is central to that kind of interaction in the ecological life of plants and animals in this country. It would reflect badly on the way that we look at and revere our countryside if the honey bee disappeared from that kind of interaction.

As I have said, the honey bee is vital to the economy in all countries, not just to the UK economy. Of course, the problem of global food shortages and high transport costs has been highlighted by our Prime Minister. It is vital that every country maximises its potential to produce home-grown food, because that is becoming the big challenge, or at least one of the big challenges, for us in the agricultural movement in this country. Honey bees have never been more important, for mankind than today.

Let us look at what the Government have done about the situation; of course, the Minister will elaborate on the Government's work. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs invests £1.5 million per annum on honey bee health, of which about a third comes through support from the European Union. Of that total budget, £1.3 million is dedicated to running a statutory inspection service to monitor and control notifiable honey bee diseases, particularly foul brood disease. That leaves what I regard as the pathetic amount of about £200,000 for research. That figure has not increased but rather declined in real terms, as inflation and other factors have come to bear on the investment.

The causes of recent increased honey bee losses are probably not related to currently notifiable diseases. Varrosis, for example, was a notifiable disease until 2006, when the Government removed it from the list, basically, it seems, because it had become endemic in the population. No solution to it has been found. In fact, matters continue to worsen as the mite develops resistance to the key approved medication. Honey bees are at increased risk from existing diseases, from new threats such as CCD and from exotic pests such as small hive beetle. Despite those heightened risks and unsolved current problems, DEFRA says that it is not prepared to find any more than the current research spend of £200,000 to confront the growing challenges and all their economic and environmental implications.

The BBKA presented a paper, "Beekeeping Research", to my noble Friend Lord Rooker and the Department last October. It set out the urgency of the matter and proposed a programme of research. Lord Rooker met representatives of the BBKA last December—I was there as well. He flatly turned down the request for funding, notwithstanding the recognition that there were risks to and benefits from honey bees. Development of the programme was initiated by the BBKA when it convened its colloquium on honey bee research in July 2007. Key researchers, DEFRA representatives and research funders were present, and they debated the threats facing bees. There has been huge movement in recognising the problem.

The indicative budget for the research programme outlined in the BBKA documentation is £8 million over five years. The association makes the pertinent point that that is a minute cost when one considers that honey bees will deliver a more than £800 million benefit over that same five-year period, but only if we keep our bees healthy. DEFRA has prepared a bee health strategy, which is designed to help maintain the health of honey bees over the next 10 years. It has 45 pages, and is worth reading. The principle of a strategy is welcome, but it has some shortcomings. It attempts to transfer an ever greater responsibility for bee health to beekeepers themselves but without providing the resources that they need. Many of the diseases affecting honey bees that I referred to earlier are passed from apiary to apiary by bees, and that is outside the control of beekeepers.

Some principles in the strategy are good; for example, better information sharing between the Government and beekeepers—we concur with that. The strategy puts an emphasis on education, which is a major part of the BBKA's remit, but the document is rather lacking in that it states that action should be evidence-based. The point being made by those who are interested is that we need more evidence and research, and that we need to gather scientific evidence, without which the strategy is doomed to fail. There are too many gaps in the knowledge base, and, of course, it will take several years to implement the strategy once it is finalised.

The issue is what we have to do now. We need to carry out research that will give us a chance to combat the threats. The proposal, with input from key researchers at Sussex university, Rothamsted Research, Warwick Horticulture Research International, Plymouth university and so on, involves short and long-term projects. It seeks to address current problems to do with varrosis and foul brood, not just the threat of CCD and exotic pests. The promising work at Rothamsted and Warwick university to develop a biological control method for varroa, an approach widely used in commercial horticulture and once funded by DEFRA, is, sadly, urgently in need of revitalisation. That is one of the largest budget elements in the plan.

In contrast, resolving the legal availability of alternative treatments such as oxalic acid through a more proportional application of the medicines directive requires good will as much as cash. The plan seeks to offset the deficit in bee virus research that has existed since Britain's leading bee virus researcher had to be made redundant by Rothamsted Research due to lack of follow-on funding from DEFRA.

Other key elements relate to improved husbandry and breeding bees that are better able to resist disease. The BBKA beekeeping research programme offers a real chance to meet those challenges. It requires money, and while all sources of financial support from research trusts, the food industry and beekeeping associations should be tapped—I believe that they are prepared to put money in—it falls to the Government to shoulder the main burden of funding and to make co-ordination possible.

DEFRA has stonewalled the requests of the BBKA, which, as a result, has mounted a public campaign to bring pressure on the Government. This debate is part of that. The BBKA has collected 30,000 signatures in eight weeks, and no doubt that number will increase. It will present its petition to the Government in the autumn during a mass lobby by beekeepers of their MPs. I had a dreadful dream last night of white-coated individuals walking past Downing street with their smokers going. Imagine the panic that that would bring to Whitehall. We have to prevent that kind of thing from happening.

The public have picked up the issue—[Interruption.]

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. There seems to be a buzz of conversation on the Benches.

Dr. Gibson: Thank you, Mr. Taylor.

It is not surprising, given the extensive coverage on radio and TV and in the press, that the public have taken up the issue. One can hardly pick up a supplement these days without seeing bees sitting on plants and a discussion of the issues. The Government have to wake up to the green political capital that they could gain by finding the rather modest sums required to bring about a far-sighted programme.

I set out the reasons for doing the research: the current unresolved problems with varroa and foul brood, which are akin to foot and mouth disease in bees. We cannot leave it to the Americans to resolve the CCD problem. The US Department of Agriculture has been mandated by the Senate to do its bit—more than $80 million has been directed to CCD research—but we would have to look into co-operation.

Beekeeping practice in the US differs greatly from that in the UK. In this country in particular, there are few commercial beekeepers and they struggle to make a living. The £165 million contribution by Britain's beekeepers is, basically, provided free of charge by the so-called Great British amateur. No doubt the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose) is, for the purpose of this conversation, a classic amateur. This place is full of classic amateurs. I do not mean the House of Commons, of course—I am so sweet—but this country. It has many classic amateurs, and they do a great job. The UK and the USA also have climatic and environmental differences, so we have to do our bit, however modest, to help deal with a global problem.

[Dr. Gibson]

Another element resulting from the structure of UK beekeeping is that it lacks the resources and resolve to rebuild losses quickly when challenged by disease. Varroa arrived in the UK in 1992, and many beekeepers gave up beekeeping in subsequent years. Varroa losses were less dramatic than those that CCD will bring, and we should remember that even then some effective proprietary medications were available. Britain's beekeepers are great amateurs. They could have played cricket for England—at one time, anyway. They keep bees because of their love of and fascination with the craft. There is not the commercial imperative to restock rapidly that exists in, for example, the USA.

I vehemently call on the Government to provide adequate urgent funding for research into honey bee health. DEFRA has stated that it awaits a business case for increased funding, but, in a sense, the Minister himself has made that case with his acceptance of the £165 million figure. The honey bee population is severely at risk, and we have to do something, or pollination and our agriculture will suffer. That "something" is to carry out research costing £1.6 million per annum in addition to the current budget. That is what we are calling for, and there will be great spin-offs from it. Any well-managed company could develop such research.

We do not need to look for new money. I believe—again, I saw it in a dream—that DEFRA has a contingency fund of £50 million, which the Minister might or might not know about. If there were the will, money could be taken from that fund to prevent an impending disaster. We cannot just wait for it to happen. When the air falls silent and we do not hear those bees a-buzzing in the summer time, there will be a change in many people's views on the subject, and on why pollination of our crops and the ecological niche that the bee fills in the environment are important.

Every hive lost represents a reduction of some £600 in agricultural output, but that is nothing compared with the greater loss that inaction will cause to our food supply and the natural environment. The Government have said that they will listen more. They listened to us over 10p tax issues. Here is another debate for them to listen to. The issue has massive support from the public. It may not be up front but it is coming. Because we love our environment and our countryside, we ask for the Government's support.

I will finish with a quote. Everybody who has ever been a scientist always finishes with a quote from a man called Einstein, who, I believe, was once a famous scientist. [Interruption.] A socialist scientist—forgive me for using that word. He stated:

> "If the bee disappeared from the surface of the globe, then man would only have four years of life left. No more bees, no more pollination, no more plants, no more animals, no more man."

That is a fitting challenge to all of us.

11.19 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), not only on securing this debate—I was also trying to secure such a debate but he beat me to it, and I am pleased that he was able to do so—but on his introducing a topic that is not a peripheral matter, although some would wish to describe it as such. It is not a peripheral matter; it is crucial to our horticulture and agriculture and to our natural environment.

My only criticism is of the debate's full title, "The future of the bee industry", because although we know that bees are incredibly industrious and that there are some commercial beekeepers, whom I suppose form an industry, the vast majority of the bees in this country are in the hands not of the 300 commercial apiaries, but of the 2,000 amateur beekeepers spread across the country, who are extremely concerned about the future of the bees that they own and love to deal with.

I have a reputation, Mr. Taylor, as perhaps do you, for pursuing quixotic subjects in the House that other hon. Members sometimes do not wish to trespass into. It could be argued that the future and the health of the bee population in this country is one such subject, but it is linked to other matters that I have pursued because, as I argue, if I do not who else will do so? The cider industry is important in my constituency. Apples need pollination and pollination is done by bees, so if the bee population declines, there is concern about the profitability and productivity of a serious industry in my constituency.

As hon. Members have already said, we are not just talking about top fruits, which are a key part of the agricultural and horticultural activity in my constituency, but about wild and semi-wild species such as clovers and vetches, which are the principal nitrogen fixers. Without nitrogen fixers, we do not have fertile soil and the nice green grass that we need to feed our livestock and create our countryside. Bees are crucial to more than is perhaps commonly recognised.

The hon. Gentleman has already pointed out the various threats to the bee population, so there is no need to go into those in detail. He mentioned particularly varroa destructor, which is, as we now know, endemic to the point of no longer requiring notification, but it would appear that we are still no nearer to either a cure or a preventive strategy. He also mentioned nosema apis and nosema ceranae, which is now entering Wales, and he could have added tracheal mites or aethina tumida. He spoke about the syndrome—I think it is a syndrome—of colony collapse disorder in America. I do not think that we have yet seen a problem on a similar scale in this country, but all of us are greatly concerned about that threat, because it does not merely decimate the bee population, but halves or eliminates it. That is of great economic concern as well, because, as the hon. Gentleman correctly said, the value of pollination by bees is estimated at anything up to £200 million, which is a significant sum. That suggests that the Government would be wise to put in a much smaller amount of investment now to save that future loss. That is the critical argument that we have to advance today.

I want to reinforce the points made by the hon. Gentleman and say clearly that research is needed now—not the trickle of funding that we have at the moment, but funding on a scale to match the threat that is recognised by those who know about such things. That needs to be coupled with other measures. We need regulation of imports and effective measures to prevent introduction of further parasitical infestation, whether relating to the importation of queens or other bees. We need to consider seriously the control of pesticides. If we are creating pesticide-resistant mite populations or other parasitical organisms, we need to look at the interaction between the use of pesticides and the creation of the degree of resistance that is creating widespread endemic infestation and, perhaps, look again at how we use pesticides in this country.

It is argued in the United States of America that there is a connection between colony collapse disorder and the genetically modified crops being used there. It is possible that disease-resistant crops are creating the circumstances in which that syndrome can develop. We need to know about that.

Dr. Gibson: While the hon. Gentleman is attacking my favourite organisms—GM crops—let me point out that it is also said that mobile phone masts are allegedly implicated in the demise of the bee population in this country. Everything is implicated, but without research, who knows?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman spent many happy years with me on the Science and Technology Committee. I am not saying that there is such a connection; I am simply saying that there is at least prima facie evidence that ought to be investigated and perhaps the United States is the appropriate place to do it.

We also need to say, on behalf of our agriculture and horticulture, that if we cannot turn back the tide of the reduction in the size of our bee colonies and the bee population, we have seriously to consider how we provide and encourage substitute pollinators, to preserve our fruit industries in at least their present state. That is, to an extent, a counsel of despair—it is certainly not what beekeepers want to hear—but we have to look at both sides of the equation. We have to deal with reversing the trend in the bee population and recognise the need to find ways of maintaining the profitability of our horticultural and agricultural sectors.

John Penrose: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that trying to find alternative insect pollinators is almost certainly a counsel of despair, for two reasons. First, honey bees are far more effective as insect pollinators at various times of the year, particularly in the early part of the season, which can be vital for some crops and wild species. Secondly, they are far more numerous than most other potential insect pollinators. Everyone mentions bumblebees, for example, but whereas there are a few hundred in a typical bumblebee colony, there are 40,000-plus honey bees in a healthy colony. The difference is enormous. Alternatives will probably be far more expensive, by a factor of 10, 100 or even more, than the hon. Gentleman proposes.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is correct. The key points are finding the reason behind the reduction in the bee population, seeing what effective measures can be taken to control infestation or infection, and disseminating the information, both on good husbandry and effective practice, whether veterinary or otherwise, to ensure that the health of the bee population is preserved. That will require investment. That is why we look to the Minister to say not simply that it is nonsense that the bee health programme has been reduced, which has been the line so far from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

DEFRA has been saying that everything is perfectly good, but it is not. We need a step change in investment in the investigation of bee disease if we are to stem a worldwide phenomenon that is lapping at our doorstep and has the potential to become a crisis, both for the insect population and in economic terms, for some sectors. We need to put in the necessary investment at this stage to stem it and reverse it. I hope that that is what we will hear the Minister say.

11.30 am

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): It is a pleasure to appear before you, Mr. Taylor.

When discussing this important topic, we should get some of the puns out of the way. You made one earlier, Mr. Taylor. The place is buzzing; it is swarming with interested MPs. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing the debate. His speech was the bee's knees, and no doubt the Government will be stung by his remarks. I hope that they will not hive off research to the private sector, but I am somewhat piqued by their insufficient action so far. I agree with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that we must consider other pollinators and so on, but I do not know whether we should call that plan B.

I like bees. They are useful—that is what we are discussing—and I just like them. I do not keep them, although I know that some hon. Members do. One reason why I like them is that they have the good sense to sport the colours of Wolverhampton Wanderers football club. In our garden in Wolverhampton there is a large lime tree, which is almost 100 years old. At the appropriate time at the height of summer—hon. Members will be able to tell me when it is, but it is usually around this time of year—that lime tree is buzzing with bees. They are not our bees, but come from elsewhere, and their number has lessened in recent years. We have lived there for 25 years, and we have noticed that in summer the tree buzzes less than it used to. We used to sit by it, hear it thrumming, and wonder what the sound was. It was hundreds of bees.

On where the UK's bee industry is going, part of the general picture of adapting to climate change that exercises me greatly is what we do about wildlife. It is important not only to deal with the causes of climate change—CO_2 emissions, greenhouse gas emissions and so on—but to face up to the reality that the climate is changing and will continue to do so, with an adverse effect on wildlife and other elements in our country. Bees may be one of the overlooked casualties of the climate change that we are experiencing.

I pay tribute to the work of the British Beekeepers Association, not only for its promotion of the industry, but its research and education of the general public and politicians such as me. I am worried that the UK is losing researchers because there are no jobs for them, and that the considerable expertise that has built up over many years in this country is being eroded because those researchers simply cannot get jobs, so they move to other fields of research or abroad.

The Government must focus on research. They cannot solve all the problems facing bees and every industry in this country, but a general rule in any industry is that about 5 per cent. should be spent on research and development. We have heard today that bee pollination boosts the value of the top 10 agricultural products by £165 million, and almost all of that gain is free because most beekeepers in this country are amateurs. They are skilled in what they do, but they do not do it for money. They do it for love. We all benefit from that, and agriculture in this country benefits to the tune of at least £165 million a year. In round terms, 5 per cent. of that is £8 million.

[Rob Marris]

I accept that the Government should not be responsible for all the research and development for the bee industry in the United Kingdom, but because it is, in a sense, a free industry, the Government should fund about half that research and development on behalf of society. They should put in about £4 million a year for something that benefits us all to the tune of more than £165 million a year. That is in contrast with the apparent amount—the Minister may enlighten us with different figures—of about £200,000 a year that the Government actually put into research; £1.3 million goes into inspection and so on, and only £200,000 is left over for research.

The contrast between £4 million a year and £200,000 a year is far too great. The BBKA's suggested figure of £8 million over five years is incredibly modest—that is no criticism of the BBKA. It is not a ridiculous amount such as politicians often come across when people suggest amounts because they believe passionately in a pet project. It is a sensible amount and, if anything, is low. I urge the Minister to consider it carefully.

John Penrose: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it might be helpful if the Minister told us whether he has had any conversations with his opposite number in the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills, which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is responsible for a great deal of academic research into all sorts of related areas? Some sort of joined-up government thinking might produce alternative pots of money that could be put to the excellent use that he is proposing.

Rob Marris: I entirely agree. It is not simply a question of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs putting in £4 million a year. The money should come from Government across the board, including the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills, and it is arguable that the Department for Children, Schools and Families might kick in in terms of education and so on. We need a cross-departmental push—it used to be called joined-up government, but I am not sure what we call it now—and Government as a totality should put in around £4 million a year for the necessary research.

Dr. Gibson: The Wellcome Trust has bailed out this country's research for years through research councils and money that it has accrued, and it would be interested in basic research in this area. Quite a few charities have big sums of money that might help, so the Government might have to pay even less.

Rob Marris: The Government could take more of a lead in bringing in organisations such as the Wellcome Trust. My hon. Friend may recall that my ballpark figure is that society and the country should put in about £8 million, which is 5 per cent. of the industry's low figure of £165 million. I posit that half—£4 million—should come from the Government, and that the other £4 million could come from the charitable foundations to which he referred and other sources, perhaps including European Union money.

The Government are underfunding research into bees, and that will be to our peril unless we do something. I am not an expert on bees, but I understand that there is only so much research that can be imported because we have our own climate, our own crops, our own way of doing things, our own strains of bees and, to some extent, our own bee diseases and infestations. We need to do research into the bee situation in the United Kingdom, and that research needs to be done by UK researchers in our own country. At least half should be funded by the Government, which is considerably more than is the case now.

11.38 am

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): I did not intend to speak in this debate, but I was inspired to do so, as I often am, by the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson). I cannot claim to have his expertise or that clearly shown by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), but I want to add my voice to those of other hon. Members and to plead with the Government to reprioritise the industry, as there is a number of serious concerns.

The haunting picture of a world without bees that the hon. Member for Norwich, North painted reminded me of Rachel Carson's famous book, "Silent Spring", which was published more than 40 years ago and launched the modern environmental movement. It was about the effects of DDT on birds and mammals. We could be looking at a similar set of factors now.

There is an argument about whether colony collapse disorder is being seen in the United Kingdom yet, but it is in Europe, so it is going global and it is a great concern. There may be a coincidence of factors behind that. Even in the United Kingdom varroa mite seems to be developing resistance, which is one problem. There is discussion in the United States that bees may be developing some kind of immune suppression syndrome, and that there could be a viral cause. Research suggests that when the Israeli acute paralysis virus is present in the hive, the hive is 65 times more likely to develop colony collapse disorder, so there seems to be a strong evidential basis there. On the other hand, Australia has that virus but no reported problems and no varroa mite. It is a very complex picture.

I have read the reports mentioned by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome which, he said, posited a link with transgenic crops. Now is not the time to engage in that debate, but it is a legitimate research area. Apart from a few papers that were written about 10 years ago, not much research has been produced in that field.

One of the problems that we face worldwide—I think this is true within in the United Kingdom—is a lack of genetic diversity within bees. As I understand it, there is a preponderance of the Italian bee. The issue is certainly of interest to Wales. We had a pocket of bees in west Wales that survived the last major collapse in the 1920s. The collapse started in the Isle of Wight and spread throughout the UK, but in Pembrokeshire and parts of Carmarthenshire, local populations of bees seemed to withstand that collapse.

The Pembrokeshire Beekeepers Association has been given some money to try to breed a local population that is adapted to local conditions. Perhaps developing such a population, which is also more resistant to varroa and tracheal mite infestation, is one of the future routes that we need to take. However, the association was given only £5,000 by the national lottery, and therein lies our problem.

The problem is very serious because all life is interconnected. Bees are connected to humans. Obviously, the apple industry could be wiped out unless we take prompt and appropriate action. Organic beekeepers in America say that they have no evidence of CCD and it has been suggested that that is because they do not fumigate for the varroa mite or use pesticides. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome said, the use of pesticides more generally—particularly neonicitinoid pesticides that have neurotoxic effects on bees and affect their learning and navigation abilities—could play some part in what we are seeing globally.

We need substantial and extensive research to help us to understand what is happening globally and to learn about the strains of disease, their effect on the UK bee population and some of the solutions—such as the one that I mentioned in Pembrokeshire. I am glad to see that the Welsh Assembly Government are playing their part by contributing £280,000 to the National Bee Unit. I urge the Minister to do more. As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) said, spending money on research would be a good investment because it would prevent a catastrophe that would devastate key elements of our agriculture industry.

11.44 am

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Taylor, and to have the opportunity to make a modest contribution to the debate on this important subject. I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing the debate.

I do not claim to be an expert in this matter, but I know what colour bees are. I am afraid that I need to correct the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) because there was an important factual inaccuracy in his comments. He referred to bees wearing the colours of his favourite football team, Wolverhampton Wanderers. The last time that I checked, their official colours were old gold and black, but the last time I saw a bee in close proximity, its colour was yellow and black, which more accurately reflects the colours of Hull City or—dare I suggest?—the Liberal Democrats, with whom they may share an allegiance.

More seriously—because this is an important debate—my participation in this matter today has largely been fired by two things. One was an article I read some weeks ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) in the Daily Mail. That article has been helpfully included in the briefing pack. To anyone who has not seen this article and does not understand the general issues that are being raised today, I would say that it is a helpful introduction to the subject. Secondly, I have been contacted by the secretary of the Cheshire Beekeepers Association, who, I am proud to say, is a constituent of mine. He too has briefed me on the importance of the issue, and that is why I have come here today to support what the hon. Member for Norwich, North has had to say and to press the Government for some indication that they accept the need to give a little more assistance to the research that is needed.

[JOHN CUMMINGS in the Chair]

I think that we all agree that there has been, beyond any reasonable doubt, a dramatic decline in the bee population, which, as we have heard, is important to the natural environment, agriculture and horticulture. What we do not know, however, are the precise reasons behind that dramatic decline. That is why research is crucial. It is fair to say that the Government have a role to play—whether through DEFRA or another body. I hope that the Government will not turn their back on this important and growing problem.

We have already heard that the British Beekeepers Association has been seeking a research grant of some £8 million over eight years. As I understand it, the Government's response to date has been to cut the research budget by some 20 per cent. There are now fewer inspectors and researchers involved in this very important area. Last November, Lord Rooker said that unless effective action is taken, bees would disappear within 10 years. That is a frightening prospect, for the reasons that we have already heard. To be frank, the solution to the problem is not the occasional very modest contribution from the lottery fund. I know that reference was made to the £5,000 that Pembrokeshire beekeepers have been awarded, and I am sure that the money will be put to extremely good use. None the less, we are looking for a lead from the Government and we want reassurance that the investment in research will be made. I press the Minister to accept that if that is not forthcoming and if we are seen to ignore the plight of the honey bee, future generations may not be quite so forgiving.

11.48 am

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): That was a quick change. I did not pick up that the Chairman had changed before I stood up to make a small contribution. It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Cummings. I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on obtaining this debate.

It has been said that beekeeping in this country is a pastime of amateurs. However, those amateurs have mounted a well-orchestrated and well-directed campaign. They have focused the minds of hon. Members on this very important issue, and I congratulate them on the work that they have done. Hon. Members have set out in great detail, and with a great deal of evidence, the fact that we are confronted with a classic case of DEFRA collapse syndrome. All the symptoms indicate that this is a classic case of doing too little too late. A lot of public money will have to be spent to undo damage that could have been prevented in the first place.

There is much evidence that bees are in decline. Certainly, in this country, 20 per cent. did not make it through the past winter, which is quite a high proportion. This morning, I spoke to a colleague, Karl Showler, who was a little more optimistic than I had anticipated. He told me that it was strange that evidence can be put in different ways and said that beekeeping was on a high at the moment. He also said that beekeepers and the quality of beekeeping had improved in recent years. He informed me that one of the reasons for that is that varroa and varroosis have meant that beekeepers who do not have the relevant dedication and expertise cannot keep their hives going and have dropped out of beekeeping activities. As such, he feels that the beekeepers who operate now are of a higher standard than he has ever known—and he has worked with bees for more than 50 years.

[Mr. Roger Williams]

The varroa disease is now endemic, but Karl Showler has told me that he has examined his hives—he has a lot fewer than he used to—and he can find no evidence of varroa at the moment. I am not sure whether that is because he is so diligent in his work and uses oxonic acid to treat his bees. I know that some of the varroa mites have become resistant to pyrethroid insecticides. The ability of diseases and parasites to become resistant to treatments is one of the reasons why we want research to be done.

Varroa is a disease that we understand and that beekeepers have been able to live and work with. However, something else is going on in our bee colonies that cannot yet be explained. We have talked about colony collapse disorder in America, and I wonder whether that has the same cause or whether we are seeing a number of unrelated things. Is colony collapse disorder related to just one disease, or have a number been affecting colonies in America?

A point that has been strongly made is that the uncertainty about the disease status of bees means we should think carefully about importing bees into this country, as my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said. I understand that queen bees can be imported from New Zealand and Hawaii, but a number of people have told me that that is a dangerous practice and that we should perhaps think about safety first. Perhaps the Minister will say something about the restrictions on imports.

One subject on which research could take place and which would be profitable is bee breeding. The hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) pointed out that work on that is going on in Pembrokeshire funded by lottery money. Research could be directed to the breeding of bees that are resistant to some of these diseases. Where there is disease resistance, there is less use of chemicals and less disruption to the bees' immune system and their natural ability to forage and find their way around.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North—I think it is Norwich, North.

Dr. Gibson: The rough part.

Mr. Williams: The beekeeping part. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that there should be biological control work to find diseases or other parasites that are parasitical upon or can infect the disease perpetrator. That is another potential avenue. This morning, I was thinking about a book written by Theresa Clay and Miriam Rothschild, "Fleas, Flukes and Cuckoos". The book discusses parasites and says that large fleas have smaller fleas upon their back to bite them and smaller fleas have lesser fleas and so on, ad infinitum. The research needed to find a biological control mechanism that can be used on particular diseases could be profitable.

The financial importance of bees and pollination has been mentioned. Insect pollination is an important part of the pollination process. Although there is self-pollination and wind pollination, the anatomy of many plants is designed to want or need insects to pollinate them. Indeed, some are designed to have only bees pollinating them, and I do not think we can look for an alternative pollinator for such plants.

Yes, pollination is important to agriculture, but it is also very important in terms of biodiversity in this country. Natural England has done much work on sites of special scientific interest and other protected areas, but if pollinators are not in those areas, the purpose of designating those sites will not be fulfilled. Perhaps the Minister can help me to answer a query I occasionally hear by saying whether bees are a species that have been in this country for all time or whether they are an introduced species. I understand that Natural England has said that bees, or hives, should not be taken to Salisbury plain because they are not an endemic species in this country and it wants to protect the ecosystem there. I have no further information on that—although I tried to find out something on it this morning. However, I think the theory is that bees were introduced into this country and are therefore not part of our natural ecosystem.

John Penrose: I hope to help the hon. Gentleman. I think I am right in saying that bees in one form or another are part of the fossil record going back many millions of years. It may be that the British or European honey bee is a relatively recently evolved species—I do not know—but honey-producing bees in one form or another have certainly been around for millions of years. They certainly go back well before Britain was ever legally invented.

Mr. Williams: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that. It has been put to me that bees were present in the fossil record, but I do not know whether the species present in Britain today—whether the wild or domestic variety—is a new species. It worries me that because wild bees are not tended in the way in which those in hives are, a number of the pollinating mechanisms for a biodiverse ecosystem are being lost.

The National Farmers Union, which represents commercial beekeepers from the Bee Farmers Association, makes the point that "there are disparities across the EU with...access to veterinary treatments for bees. Considering the underpinning importance of bees to the horticultural and agricultural industries across the EU, the NFU calls on the UK government to take action to ensure UK bee farmers and beekeepers have the same ready access to veterinary treatments for bees as their EU counterparts."

I ask the Minister to respond to that request.

The message is clear. Something unexplained is going on in bee colonies that affects our beekeepers' interests. The amount of money allocated to research is small. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) did a fantastically complex mathematical calculation and came up with the sum of £4 million. A number of hon. Members would have liked £8 million, but the hon. Gentleman's request is probably more reasonable. The message from this debate and the campaign launched by beekeepers is that the Government should do something now, or the consequences will be such that the position may not be recoverable. I, too, ask the Minister to consider increasing investment in research, so that we can find an explanation for what is going on and a cure for the diseases and complications now being exhibited.

12.1 pm

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing this important debate.

I pay tribute to the British Beekeepers Association, which has done much to raise the profile of beekeeping and to inform us about the importance of bees to our country. It has put a tremendous amount of effort into its campaign, and its commitment to bee health is keeping the issue high on the political agenda. I understand that its campaign has already succeeded in attracting the support of 30,000 people who have signed its petition.

This debate is timely, and I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us of his Department's commitment to bee health. The British bee industry is far more than just the sweet taste of honey. Who could imagine an English summer without the humble honey bee? Bees are amazing creatures whose value is easily overlooked. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs estimates that there may be more than 270,000 managed bee colonies in the UK, there being 5 billion bees in the winter rising to 16 billion in the summer.

As hon. Members have already pointed out, the pollination service provided by those colonies and bees could be worth about £165 million, and estimates of their total contribution to our economy is somewhere in the region of £1 billion. They also add tremendous value to our countryside, especially in pollinating wild flowers, as we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose).

Most of Britain's 44,000 beekeepers are not professionals, who keep bees to make profits from honey sales and pollination services. They are small-scale hobbyists, whose numbers have been increasing. In greater London, for example, between 1999 and 2006 the number of beekeepers doubled to at least 2,000. However, because so many beekeepers are hobbyists, they are more vulnerable to the pressures now facing the nation's bees. As their livelihoods do not depend on beekeeping, many may be discouraged from continuing if they lose their colonies. In the USA, beekeepers have significant commercial interests in re-stocking, but those incentives are simply not available for UK beekeepers. That is a very real problem for us at the moment.

British beekeeping may now be at its most vulnerable, as bee health is threatened on a number of fronts. We all know of the impact that varroa has had in recent years. The varroa mite has caused considerable damage to hives and bee colonies, to the point where it is now classed as endemic. Our bee population may now be facing the far more dangerous threat of colony collapse disorder. Having seen the destruction caused by CCD in the USA, some, including Lord Rooker in the other place, have suggested that if nothing is done there may be no more honey bees in the UK within 10 years. CCD may already be in the UK.

The BBKA has reported that its research has found that as many as 30 per cent. of our colonies could be lost during the winter months this year. That is twice last year's rate and three times more than is usual since varroa arrived in the UK. Throughout the country, beekeepers are reporting significant losses. In Peterborough, for example, the secretary of the Peterborough and District Beekeepers Association, George Newton, lost 10 of his 18 hives this winter. In Scotland, John Troup, another beekeeper, reported significant losses—100 hives, each of which should have contained up to 80,000 bees.

Given the enormous value of bees to our country, that is a worrying proposition to put to those who depend on bees for pollination—which is invariably all of us. The future of our bee populations can be secured only if those dangers are properly managed and if action is taken in the near future to protect bee health. Hon. Members who take an interest in bee health will be aware that there has been considerable criticism of DEFRA in previous years over the way that it has treated bee health.

The Agricultural Development and Advisory Service's economic evaluation of DEFRA's bee health programme in 2001 recommended that:

> "A method should be sought to protect small bio-security programmes of this sort from general attempts to cut public expenditure—so called salami slicing."

Although DEFRA accepted that recommendation in principle, it is questionable whether the Department has followed that advice.

The budget for bee health and the National Bee Unit has been cut in real terms over the last few years, with spending remaining at around £1.5 million, half of which comes from the European Union. Bee health is in need of investment, and it would be helpful if the Minister let us know whether his Department will be making any extra resources available for bee health research.

The idea behind the draft bee health strategy is welcome. Indeed, the BBKA has been pressing for it for some time. It is important that a long-term strategy be put in place, that research needs be prioritised and that the responsibilities of beekeepers and the Government be clarified. However, all the effort and the time put into developing the strategy by DEFRA's stakeholders will have little impact if the resources are not in place to fund the required research.

In a written answer last month, the Minister could not confirm how much would be allocated to bee health in this financial year, hinting only that the figure would remain static at about £190,000. However, as hon. Members will know, the BBKA has identified research projects costing somewhere in the region of £8 million. At the present rate of spending by DEFRA, it would take 40 years to cover all those research priorities.

It therefore comes as no surprise that, in its response to the publication of the draft strategy, the BBKA stated:

> "Most importantly the BBKA has no confidence in government's commitment to funding additional work and services needed to keep our honey bees healthy."

[Bill Wiggin]

It would help if the Minister let us know when research allocations for this year will be finalised, whether he will make extra resources available for bee health research and whether he accepts the BBKA's proposals.

Rob Marris: I posited a figure of £4 million a year, and the BBKA posited a figure of £8 million over five years. What does the hon. Gentleman think the figure ought to be?

Bill Wiggin: I think that the BBKA figure of £8 million is correct, which is £1.6 million a year over five years. However, the difficulty facing the Minister and all who consider the figures is whether that is an absolute amount and it will guarantee a result. We know because we regularly meet scientists that budgets tend to grow over time and that it would be impossible for anyone to guarantee that a solution would be found within that time. We recognise the constraints that DEFRA has to work under, but today we seek a commitment from the Minister that more funding will be available for the necessary research. I shall say why.

This year, two bee-related research projects will come to an end: an assessment of the effectiveness of the shook swarm method for controlling European foul brood, at a cost of £185,393, and the development of a monitoring system for the small hive beetle, at a cost of £225,772. Those projects had a combined cost of more than £411,000. Will the Minister confirm whether an amount will be reinvested in bee health research similar to that spent on the projects that are coming to an end?

DEFRA is funding only two other research projects at the moment. The numerous threats that face our bee populations—varroa, viruses, hive beetles, foul brood and colony collapse disorder—make a compelling case for undertaking more research. Unfortunately, due to Government cuts, we are in a weakened position when it comes to supporting bee health. Bee research has not been given the priority and resources that it needs from the Government. As a result, we are losing crucial expertise in this area and we are now really feeling the effects.

In 2006, our leading research centre at Rothamsted lost some of the world's top experts in bee health, including Dr. Brenda Ball, a world-renowned expert on bee viruses and pathology with more than 30 years' experience, Caroline Birchall, a graduate scientist working on the biocontrol of varroa project, and Norman Carreck, a bee scientist and keeper with 20 years' experience. Regrettably, that also means that the reference collection of bee virus samples has gone to Sweden. Because the Central Science Laboratory does not have the expertise or resources available, the progress that those scientists could have made has been lost, and there is a vacuum that needs to be filled.

By contrast, a greater commitment has been made to researching bee health in other countries. In the USA, $80 million from the Government and industry is being invested into researching bee health and colony collapse disorder. Although it might be helpful to see the outcomes of that research, we should remember that it is no substitute for research in this country because that can focus on the localised conditions, environment and climate of the British Isles.

I welcome the efforts of the BBKA to press DEFRA to consider providing the resources necessary to give bee health the research priority it needs, and its efforts in finding funding from other sources, such as the Wellcome Trust, which was mentioned.

It is important that the Government do not try to hide from their responsibilities to beekeepers and the wider economy. We are looking for leadership, not spending commitments. This is one of the most serious issues facing British agriculture and, as such, the Minister needs to guarantee that the Government will listen to the responses of the BBKA and others to the bee health strategy, so that it can be implemented as soon as possible and so that it is a workable solution to the challenges faced by beekeepers and the nation's bees.

12.11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jonathan Shaw): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) for introducing this timely debate and other hon. Members for their contributions. It gives me the opportunity to explain the Government's position on bee health and especially our plans for working with beekeepers to secure a healthy and sustainable bee population, as was set out in the draft bee health strategy, which is currently out for public consultation. I want to get our view on some important issues on the record and then address the sheaf of questions that hon. Members raised. Perhaps I can answer those questions if hon. Members resist intervening unless they are compelled to do so—that is for you, Mr. Cummings, to determine.

The development of the Government's strategy confirms our ongoing commitment to protecting and improving the health of honey bees and to sustaining and supporting beekeeping now and for future generations. The aim of the strategy is a sustainable and healthy population of bees for pollination and honey production in England and Wales via strengthened partnership between Government and other stakeholders. It seeks to address the challenges facing beekeepers. In particular, it sets out outcomes, activities and priorities for protecting and improving the health of honey bees in England and Wales, and the roles and responsibilities of Government and other stakeholders in achieving those objectives. The intention is to provide direction and focus for Government, beekeepers and other stakeholders to work together for the next decade on sustaining honey bees. Strengthened partnership working is crucial in achieving the strategy's aim and outcomes, and it will ensure that both current and evolving threats to bee health are effectively identified, assessed and acted upon.

Before outlining the key outcomes on which we wish to focus, I should like to say something about the work that the Government have already undertaken to protect bee health. As was mentioned, the National Bee Unit and its inspectors receive annual funding of around £1.3 million from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and a further £300,000 from the Welsh Assembly Government. Additionally, DEFRA allocates about £200,000 to specific bee health research. I put it that way because bee health benefits from a number of additional generic research projects. For example, the Department is funding the development of a biosecurity microchip to detect a range of viruses, including bee viruses. The proportion of additional work attributed to bee health is estimated to be worth around £120,000.

The main activities of the National Bee Unit are: providing effective, risk-based inspection and enforcement through a field team of professional bee inspectors to control notifiable pests and diseases, and to implement regulations; undertaking research and development; communicating evidence-based specialist advice to all stakeholders; contributing to policy development, including horizon scanning and risk management of current and emerging threats; providing quality-assured diagnostic services on outbreaks of pests and diseases; contingency planning for the arrival of exotic pests and diseases and other emerging threats—I shall come to hon. Members' points about that; and supporting the development of good husbandry through training and education programmes that are co-ordinated with national and local associations and that aim to help beekeepers to become more self-reliant in controlling pests and disease and to aspire to higher standards of beekeeping.

That is a pretty impressive list of activities but it does not tell the full story. The National Bee Unit is one of the leading centres of expertise in bee health in Europe and a major contributor to bee science, with an international reputation for excellence. That expertise is made readily available to our beekeepers. However, the Government cannot protect and sustain bee health by ourselves, nor should it be that way. The various challenges and threats can be properly addressed only through effective partnership working, with individual beekeepers at the heart of the relationship. As the draft strategy that was produced following extensive discussions with key stakeholders makes clear, local beekeeping associations have a key role in helping to support, encourage and educate beekeepers to adhere to best practice. That is important.

The debate is about the future of the bee industry. It needs to be recognised that in this country, the industry comprises both professional beekeepers and a much larger contingent of hobby beekeepers, as hon. Members have rightly emphasised. That presents particular challenges. The craft of beekeeping is not a hobby to be taken up lightly; it brings with it responsibilities to ensure that effective pest and disease control and associated good husbandry are adhered to. Thankfully, many good beekeepers and a range of active associations are ready to help, in addition to the wealth of information available from the National Bee Unit. However, not all those who keep bees choose to seek advice or to make themselves known, which is a concern and something that needs to change. I urge all those who keep bees to read the strategy and to get in touch either directly with the NBU or via their local association.

The importance of engaging has been given renewed emphasis by the many reports of colony collapse, which raises the question of how seriously our bees are under threat. Many of our beekeepers have experienced significant losses. Those are being investigated by the NBU as a matter of priority. Additional funding of £90,000 this financial year has been allocated for that work and to carry out the necessary checks on the resulting increase in imported replacement stocks. I am pleased to report that the more recent upturn in the weather is aiding recovery, including the expansion of existing colonies.

Colony losses are not solely a UK phenomenon. There have been high losses in a number of other European states: Denmark, Spain, Germany and Italy have all reported losses, many at a higher level than those seen in the UK. The French agency for food safety has set up a working group, which includes the UK, to analyse the position. To aid the group, the European Food Safety Authority has been asked to collate information on losses throughout the Community. We will engage closely in any follow-up work. We are also in contact with the authorities in the US and have discussed their investigations into colony collapse, but there is more work to be done.

Dr. Gibson: The Minister is talking about other countries. I mentioned that $80 million is being spent in the United States, but how much do France, Italy and Greece spend on research similar to that for which we are asking in this country?.

Jonathan Shaw: We do not have a record of what each EU member state does, but I shall come to the situation of England and Wales in that context in the time remaining.

There is still more work to be done. The emerging picture is that there seems to be no single cause of colony losses and that a multitude of factors could play a part, as hon. Members have said. Our investigations indicate that poor varroa control and lack of attention to good husbandry—particularly when combined with a poor summer last year and a poor early spring this year—have played a significant role in many losses in this country, and we will continue to investigate.

The strategy sets out five key outcomes, with detailed actions to be taken to achieve them, and I have covered most of the points involved. They include effective communications and good standards, but we must also ensure that a sound science and evidence base underpins bee health policy and its implementation. Much has been said about increased funding, and we will put in additional money, as I said.

On the points raised by hon. Members, the British Beekeepers Association launched an initiative last year to host research with DEFRA, and we supported that. The initiative was an important first step in bringing together a broad spectrum of key players to take stock of the range of work under way. DEFRA followed up by creating a research funders' forum to bring together key parties to improve co-ordination and collaboration on bee health research and to draw on all potential sources of funding. The forum has met twice and is due to meet again this autumn to discuss priorities in the light of responses to the strategy. As the forum's name suggests, the intention is to identify funding sources. It is important to recognise that tackling the issue is a matter not just for the Government and that others must play their part.

Bill Wiggin: The Minister said that more money was coming from the Government. The BBKA and all the beekeepers who read this debate will welcome that. He said the meeting will be held in the autumn, but could he tell us a little about how much money will come in and when?

Jonathan Shaw: Let me repeat that we are allocating an additional £90,000 to the NBU this financial year as a matter of priority.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North talked about colony collapse. We have looked at almost 10,000 colonies this year, and 19.7 per cent. had died, compared with 15.4 per cent. at the same time last year. Varroa is endemic. The NBU continues to provide advice to beekeepers; indeed, I have with me publications on managing varroa. On behalf of commercial companies, the unit is also looking at the development of veterinary medicines. Varroa is recognised as a key issue in the strategy.

Virtually every hon. Member said that they were not an expert on this issue, but the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose) probably is the expert in our ranks—[Interruption.] Well, once someone raises themselves up in the eyes of politicians, they become an expert.

Dr. Gibson: He is the queen bee around here.

Jonathan Shaw: There we are. I am afraid that the jokes this morning have been appalling.

Importantly, the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare talked about collaboration. A number of institutions are undertaking research, although I will not read out all their names, given the time that I have. However, a range of research projects are under way, and various Departments are joining up. It is right that collaboration is key.

The same is true of working with other European states. That has not been done before on this issue, but the UK has pushed for collaboration. The National Bee Unit has the science, the service, the research and the diagnostics under one roof. We do not know of any other unit that offers the same service, certainly in the European Union. On these issues, other countries look to us, not least for contingency arrangements, and they will take our arrangements as a blueprint when dealing with losses due to a variety of diseases. In a similar way, we have contingency arrangements for dealing with different animal disease outbreaks. We are putting research funding in. We are also seeking to have discussions on working with the Wellcome Foundation, as hon. Members have said.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) drew attention to the horticultural industry in his constituency, in Somerset. He talked about tightening the rules on imports, and we certainly want to look at that. Again, the UK has been pushing the issue at a European level. It is coming higher up the political spectrum in the UK, and we have been leading on it in the European Union.

We need to collaborate. Time and again, hon. Members have said that we need to find out what is going on. That requires beekeepers in England and Wales to co-operate with us, to provide us with the information that we need and to take part in the strategy. We are keen that people give us their thoughts on the strategy; otherwise, it will not be complete.

Mark Hunter: Will the Minister give way?

Jonathan Shaw: I have only five minutes, but I have a whole raft of questions to answer.

The hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) set out his concerns, as did many other hon. Members. He said that the picture is complex, and it is. He also referred to the funding from the Welsh Assembly Government.

The hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) referred to a constituent of his. He asked whether we were turning our back on people, and we are certainly not doing that. We are very much engaged in these issues, which is why we published the draft strategy. We want people to be involved in it, and I urge the hon. Gentleman to ask his constituent to take part in the process and to make a contribution.

My noble Friend Lord Rooker said that bees might disappear; he did not predict that they would. Clearly, however, we need to manage our resources and to understand how diseases impact on our bee population.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) made a reasonably good joke at my expense. However, he also spoke about a constituent who was optimistic and talked about better expertise. We all want expertise to flourish, because good husbandry is key to resolving the issue. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the NFU and compared us with other European countries. Part of the strategy relates to the accessibility of medicines and the procedures available under European Community veterinary medicines legislation. We are committed to encouraging marketing authorisations for additional treatments.

The hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) made a good speech recognising that we need to find out far more about what is going on. That requires collaboration and important information. He also welcomed the strategy, and I thank him for that. As I said, we want people to engage with it and to make a contribution.

I am grateful for hon. Members' contributions. We take the issue seriously. We know that people are passionate about beekeeping. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) said that he was passionate about it and that he loved bees, although he had some appalling jokes. However, this is a serious issue, and hon. Members have articulated concerns on behalf of constituents whom they have met.

Adam Price: Is the Minister aware that an Australian parliamentary committee has today said that 50 million Australian dollars should be invested in protecting the future of the bee industry there? Could we not see a fraction of a similar commitment from the UK Government?

Jonathan Shaw: I have not seen that statement from Australia, but I have indicated that there are additional resources. As the hon. Member for Leominster said, we need to understand what is happening so that we know what we need to fund and what priorities we need to set.

This has been an informative debate, and it is part of the wider discussion that we will have in this place and outside. I am grateful for the information that hon. Members have brought to the debate from their parts of England and Wales.

Post Office Closures (Shropshire)

12.30 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I am most grateful for this opportunity to highlight the impact of proposed post office closures in Shropshire to the House and, hopefully, to the Minister responsible. I speak as secretary of the all-party group on post offices. I had thought that that association—[Interruption.]

John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. Will Members please leave the Chamber in silence? Members of the public should also leave in silence.

Mr. Dunne: Thank you, Mr. Cummings. I had thought that my being an officer of the all-party group might help my campaign on behalf of my constituents, but as I shall explain, the Post Office has shown me no favours whatever for that relationship, as it seems to have singled out the constituency of Ludlow for the harshest treatment of all in its review of Shropshire and Staffordshire. I am pleased that this debate is supported by my parliamentary colleague from Shropshire, my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard). With your permission, Mr. Cummings, I shall try to give him the opportunity to contribute to this short debate.

I sought today's debate in order to give the Minister a last chance to explain to the people of Shropshire why he is forcing through so many post office closures. It is ironic that he seeks to slash the post office network by 2,500 post offices across the country without the support of 89 of his parliamentary colleagues, including several Ministers—the Home Secretary and the Justice Secretary, to name but two—who have campaigned actively against closures in their constituencies.

Before I get into the specifics of the closure programme in Shropshire, I have a question that I hope the Minister will address in his response, as it would clarify a point put to me by many of my constituents. The Government have decided to limit the subsidy that they provide to Post Office Ltd to maintain the rural post office network. The subsidy of £150 million has been fixed at that level for the next three years, as the comprehensive spending review confirms. Quite properly, under EU regulations, that state subsidy required confirmation by EU authorities under state aid rules. Did the Government have any discretion over the amount of the subsidy subjected to the EU approval process? Was the £150 million limit set by the EU or the Government?

As of today, 810 post offices have been confirmed for closure in areas where plans have been concluded. Only 43 had been saved as of last night, yet they have been saved at the expense of a further 23 that were not originally identified for closure. A net of 20 saved out of 810 is a mere 2.5 per cent. It shows why communities up and down the country feel that the consultation process is but a sham.

Post Office Ltd decided to review the counties of Shropshire and Staffordshire together, as a single area. That decision introduces an urban bias into the review process, as combining the sparsely populated rural county of Shropshire with the much more densely populated county of Staffordshire allows the overall access criteria to be met more readily than if the exercise had been undertaken county by county. According to Post Office Ltd, the combined population is 1.48 million, which allows the Post Office to claim in its area plan that

"98.3% of the population will see no change to the branch that they currently use or will remain within one mile of an alternative outlet".

Shropshire has a population of only 286,300, according to the county council. That is less than 20 per cent. of the total population of the area covered by the plan, yet it is to bear the brunt of the closures. Post Office Ltd claims that it proposes to close 53 existing branches in both counties, an area that includes the unitary authority of Telford, which is represented in part by my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin.

Post Office Ltd also claims that it will establish 12 outreach service points. That is little short of double-speak. In order for an outreach to be established, a post office must close, so we are in fact facing 65 closures, 28 of which will be in Shropshire, including one in Telford. Half of those, 14, are in Ludlow constituency alone. Out of 17 constituencies subject to review, 21.5 per cent of the total number of post offices to be closed are in one constituency where less than 6 per cent. of the population live, assuming that the constituencies are all of comparable size. Not for the first time under this Government, a disproportionate burden will fall on the rural population. In winding up this debate, will the Minister explain why?

The consultation for our area ended on 9 June. Post Office managers are due to make their final decisions by the end of this month and to announce closures on 1 July. I hope that they will take into account the serious comments and considerable effort put into representations made by many of the communities affected. I have made my own comments and, the Minister will be relieved to hear, will not go into the details of the case for each individual post office. The plans have met with considerable opposition. On the evening that the consultation closed, I presented a petition to the House in which, including the e-mail petition, more than 2,500 signatories objected to the individual closures planned in my constituency.

I have some general observations that I would like the Minister to address. First, the access criteria were meant to be framed by the Government so that "no particular part of the network and no particular group of people should be significantly more adversely affected by closures".

How does he square that with the impact on my constituency, which has a significantly higher proportion of elderly people than the national average? Some 24 per cent. of the population in south Shropshire is over 65, compared with 17 per cent. nationally. Those people, who include many of the most vulnerable in local communities, rely heavily on their local post offices for access to cash—there are no banks in villages in my constituency—and indeed for much of their social interaction. How do the Government square that with their approach to financial inclusion?

Secondly, many of the data used by the Post Office to make its closure case have been incomplete or inaccurate. Local population statistics have been wrong. Geographic circumstances were meant to be recognised as part of the consultation, but as I illustrated graphically to Post Office managers when they visited my constituency in areas representing each of the communities affected, an 800 ft vertical rise above sea level within a couple of miles from one post office to another does not make for a credible, realistic alternative outlet, although it might appear to when viewed on a two-dimensional map.

[Mr. Dunne]

Thirdly, economic impact assessments have focused almost entirely on the impact on Post Office Ltd rather than on the local economy. Are not the Government under an obligation to undertake a meaningful impact assessment? If so, why have they failed to require that for an exercise so vital to local communities? Post offices—particularly when they are the last shop in the village, as nine out of the 14 post offices at stake in my constituency are—provide a vital economic lifeline. Once closed, they are most unlikely to reopen. Why has no meaningful economic impact assessment been undertaken of the impact of closures on those communities?

Fourthly, no account has been taken of rural deprivation. Why not? Deprivation is not confined to urban areas. Other Departments recognise pockets of deprivation in all rural areas, yet no attempt has been made to dovetail the network of continuing post office provision with maps of rural deprivation. Why not?

I turn briefly to some of the specific issues relating to the post offices subject to closure in my area. My constituency contains two towns of 10,000 people: Bridgnorth, which I am pleased to say has three post offices, none of which are proposed for closure, and Ludlow, which is extremely similar in size and has two post offices, one of which is due for closure. Why are towns of similar size and social characteristics given such widely differing post office provision?

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): My hon. Friend makes a very strong case for why those post offices should remain open. Like them, the King street post office in Wellington, in my constituency, which has been used by all age groups over many years, is due to close. The Government need to think very seriously about the impact of the closures on rural life and communities.

Mr. Dunne: I am very grateful for that powerful intervention. No account seems to have been taken of the impact on those communities, other than the fig leaf of the outreach service, to which I shall come in a moment, and behind which the Government seem to be seeking to hide when they talk about continued provision in rural areas.

Mark Pritchard: What is my hon. Friend's view of the Post Office card account? That is a very important lifeline, and those who have survived the current closure round will remain under threat if the Government withdraw it in 2010.

Mr. Dunne: I thank my hon. Friend for anticipating something that I was going to raise in my speech. I hope that the Minister will respond to the allegation made by the National Federation of SubPostmasters, which has calculated that if Post Office Ltd does not resecure the contract for the card account, and if it is given to a competing company, up to 4,000 further post offices could face closure. The Post Office card account is vital, particularly in rural areas, because, given the lack of alternative access to cash and other financial services, the post office is for many people the only place where they can access cash.

Furthermore, the more elderly customers, in particular, of the Post Office tended to subscribe to the card account when it was introduced. Originally there were more than 4 million card account users, but that number has declined as the Post Office has been unable to invest in the product pending its resubmission. Indeed, the whole viability of the account was cast into doubt more than a year ago, so it has not been possible for it truly to compete with other products available more widely. Usage has therefore been declining. It is vital that the account be retained by Royal Mail, and it would be helpful if the Minister indicated the timing and likelihood of it being retained.

The other threat to the overall number of post offices comes from those currently closed, but not being counted as closures. The Government have set this arbitrary figure of 2,500, and I have referred to the potential loss of a further 4,000 if the card account is not secured. In addition, however, a number of post offices are currently closed, but for the purposes of the review are recorded as open. There are two such post offices in my constituency: one is in the village of Middleton Scriven—I am willing to name it because it has been closed for the past 18 months. There are 22 households in the parish, and for a long time the post office was run from the front room of a local resident's house. That person passed away, and it was taken on by a retired gentleman after a lifetime working in the financial services industry. He wrote to me in January of last year saying that he was willing to provide the service for as long as he could, but that, given that he had only two customers a week, he did not anticipate a rush of willing volunteers to take over his role when he came to give up, which he subsequently did.

The Post Office has twice readvertised for someone to provide that service to the community of Middleton Scriven, but unsurprisingly there have been no takers. And yet, under this review, such a post office ought naturally to be considered for closure. The local community has already become used to the fact that no facility is available, but owing to the arbitrary access criteria, the Government have made it difficult for the Post Office to recognise it as a closure or to count it as one of the post offices to be closed. It would be very helpful if the Minister commented on the credibility of that programme, given that he is leaving open post offices that have already closed. That would be very welcome in Shropshire.

Another category of very small post offices currently provided for demonstrates—again—a complete lack of logic in the Government's approach. Of the 45 post offices in my constituency, six are provided through short-term arrangements at village halls. In a sense, they represent a precursor to the outreach planned under the current arrangements. In some of those facilities, no indication is given on the outside of the building that any post office activity is taking place inside. That might be done for sensible security reasons—so that there is no open invitation to break in to those who might think that cash is stored on the premises. That might be a wise precaution, but it means that only the immediate users in the village know when the post office is functioning. The number of users will decline pretty rapidly, therefore, when a post office closes and outreach provision is put in place in an anonymous village hall.

One such facility continues to operate in my constituency, within a mile and a half of a post office run from the premises of a garage forecourt. That village hall provision is available for two hours a week, but the hours have changed in the past two years, and I myself have not managed to go when it has been open. That outreach service is provided by someone whose equipment has not been working recently, so in recent months he has been driving its two or three customers to the post office a mile and a half away to conduct their transactions and driving them back again. Yet the Government and the Post Office have proposed that the village hall service should continue, and that the much more used—albeit it is not used much because it is a relatively small village—post office shop facility should close. That is illogical, and I have made representations to the Post Office urging it to reconsider.

I shall turn to some of the other outreach proposals. It seems nonsensical for the Government to insist on the closure of a post office being run from a shop's premises and then to prevent a continuing outreach service—a service that Post Office Ltd has agreed should be provided to a community given its geographic isolation—from being provided on the same premises. There is a very urban approach to competition, and it is feared that if such a shop continues to be recognised as the local post office, business would be driven away from neighbouring post offices. Inevitably, if an outreach facility is set up to provide a service for a few hours a week, from a mobile van parked up outside a village hall or a pub someplace distant from the previous shop post office, usage will decline relatively rapidly, as I described earlier. Why not try to help local communities being harmed anyway by post office closures by allowing the service to continue to be provided either from the premises, or from the car park or adjacent area of the existing shop? Why does the Minister think that communities will get a better service from such a mobile facility located remotely?

In conclusion, I urge the Minister and, through him, Post Office Ltd to take account of representations made by many constituents—not just the 2,500 signed petitions, but the extensive written submissions presented on behalf of many of the communities affected. Worthen has made a particularly powerful case, as have the villages of Marton and East Hamlet, in Ludlow, where more than a thousand people have participated in attempts to retain a post office. I have also had representations from the community of Lydbury North, which is suffering the possible loss of not only its post office but its school. That post office is within a community shop that is manned by volunteers, which means that it can provide an extremely cost-effective service as the existing shop is already being supplied to the community at virtually no cost.

12.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Let me start in the usual way by congratulating the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) on securing the debate. My hon. Friend the Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs is unable to attend the debate due to business in another part of the House. Neither my hon. Friend nor I have a role in deciding which post offices should close. That is a matter for Post Office Ltd following a consultation involving Postwatch, local people, Members of Parliament and others.

The proposed closures in Shropshire are part of the wider programme announced last year by the then Secretary of State to reduce the network by up to 2,500 post offices, thus taking the number of branches to about 11,500. The background to that difficult decision is that the network is losing about £500,000 a day. It has 4 million fewer customers a week than it had three years ago and 75 per cent. of branches are unprofitable. If it were run as a commercial network, it would probably have only about 4,000 branches. In some rural branches, the cost per transaction is £17. That decline is the result of a combination of lifestyle changes, new technology and increased competition. Eight out of 10 pensioners have their pensions paid directly into the bank and 1 million customers a month renew their car tax online, compared with 500,000 a year ago. The Post Office now faces competition from companies such as PayPoint, which won the contract for the TV licence. I add that the Government played no part in that decision.

Faced with those challenges, the Government have taken the necessary difficult decisions to put the network on a stable footing. The challenges have been recognised by the National Federation of SubPostmasters whose general secretary said at the start of the programme:

"Although regrettable we believe that closures are necessary to ensure the remaining post offices are able to thrive in the future".

Even the shadow Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan), has said in a debate on the post office network that "we have to face the facts about the future of postal services in this country...we fully expect the network to shrink in size. We have never given a guarantee that no post offices will close". —[Official Report, 19 March 2008; Vol. 473, c. 947.]

I understand the fundamental premise that no one wants their local post office to close, but it is important to see the changes in their proper context. Even after the programme, the network will still be larger than the major high street banks combined.

Mark Pritchard: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Thomas: Not with the time that is available, as I want to answer the questions of the hon. Member for Ludlow.

As the hon. Member for Ludlow has indicated, at least 500 new outreach services will be introduced, mainly in rural areas, including seven mobile services in his constituency. They are a cost-effective means of ensuring continued access to post office services in rural areas, and research shows that customer satisfaction levels for them are comparable to those for traditional post offices. The Government have also committed additional funding of £1.7 billion up to 2011, including £150 million per year to support non-commercial post offices. The hon. Gentleman asked whether the European Commission was dictating how many post offices should close or how much subsidy should be provided. Let me make it clear that a maximum level of state aid to subsidise post offices is not included, for example, in the European postal services directive, which has been one concern. Decisions about the level of subsidy were not part of some sort of price agreed with the Commission about the number of closures. Those decisions remain very much the preserve of the UK Government.

[Mr. Thomas]

The access criteria laid down by the Government are designed to ensure a national network with reasonable access to post office services throughout the country. Broadly speaking, most people should be within one mile of a post office outlet in urban areas and within three miles in rural communities. Without the access criteria, many more rural communities would be left without access to post office services, as only the least used branches are closed.

Before change proposals are published, Post Office Ltd discusses them with local authorities and sub-postmasters. On average, 12.5 per cent. of proposals have been changed as a result of detailed input from key stakeholders such as Postwatch before the local public consultation. As the hon. Gentleman indicated, a number of closure decisions have been withdrawn, but I accept that some, though not as many, additional branches have been proposed for closure.

There has been much discussion about the closure of allegedly profitable branches, but people should be cautious when talking about what is profitable. When one takes into account the remuneration that must be paid to the sub-postmaster, as well as the Post Office's central support costs, three out of four post offices lose money. The Government have encouraged the Post Office to explore fully any serious proposal from a local authority to maintain a service where a branch is scheduled to close, although it would want to ensure that its costs would be met in full and that there would be some certainty for the future. Such arrangements would also need to be state aid compatible.

Mr. Dunne: The example of Essex county council has received much attention in the media recently. Will the Minister confirm that local authorities are being provided with no additional subsidy from the Government, and that local authorities offering to take on post offices are therefore proposing to replace the subsidy that the Government provide?

Mr. Thomas: I can confirm that no additional subsidy is being made available by the Government to the local authorities concerned. Such decisions to get involved are very much for them to take.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the card account, and I recognise that there are concerns about that. He might know that the Department for Work and Pensions is managing the tender process for the new card account. Clearly, it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the outcome of that process, but we expect that there will be an announcement on the successful bidder in the coming months, in accordance with the usual procurement rules.

Looking to the future, the Post Office needs to keep developing new products and new reasons for customers to come through the door. There has been progress in that direction, with the Post Office emerging as the largest foreign currency dealer in the country, developing car and household insurance products and providing broadband in association with British Telecom. It is also actively exploring a range of new business opportunities, and is developing and trialling new approaches to providing and delivering services to local authorities.

The future of the network cannot be about turning back the clock; it must be about developing new products and new reasons for customers to use post offices. As I said at the outset, the process is not easy and there will inevitably be considerable concerns in communities faced with the prospect of local branch closures. However, doing nothing in the face of declining business and mounting losses simply is not an option.

Regeneration of Featherstone

1 pm

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): I am delighted to address the House under your chairmanship, Mr. Cummings. I know that because of your background, you have a great affinity with mining areas and former mining villages. Featherstone is one of several communities in west Yorkshire that I have the privilege to represent. I am pleased to see a distinguished and diligent Minister in his place to respond to the debate. I shall seek to persuade the Government that Featherstone has particular regeneration needs, and I hope that he will be able to address them.

When I first arrived in my constituency, in which there are about 23 villages or small townships, the shadow of the strike and the subsequent closure of all the collieries there was still strongly felt in almost every village. I have a strong image in my mind of the devastation that those terrible closures wrought on those communities. The work of regenerating them is still far from finished, but I am pleased to say that many villages, small towns, communities and neighbourhoods are looking forward to real growth and regeneration. The struggle has been hard but rewarding.

When considering regeneration in Featherstone, there are people who say that the glass is half full, but also those who say that it is half empty. Whichever view one takes, the process of regeneration is far from complete, for a number of reasons to do with Featherstone's history and geographical location. It stands some way from the M62, the M1 and the A1, which form the main road network around the communities that I represent. Many of the others are much closer to the motorway and therefore easier to regenerate.

Featherstone is still the sixth most deprived ward in the Wakefield area, and some parts of the town are in the most deprived 5 per cent. in the whole country. That statistic speaks volumes. A lot has been done, some of which I shall mention, but the people of Featherstone and I will not be satisfied until regeneration becomes a self-sustaining process and there is a virtuous circle of regeneration. We are not there yet. That is why I wish to argue the case for Featherstone becoming what will be called a coalfield action partnership area. I would like CAP status to be applied to Featherstone.

Let me recount work that has been done on three matters, the first of which is jobs. When I first arrived in Featherstone on the proud day when I had been selected as the Labour candidate, I drove through the town past a road that appeared to go to nowhere—indeed, that was exactly what it did. The road was part of Green lane and went to where the colliery had been. It had been paid for with European money. It was a wonderful road, beautifully tarmacked and with street lights and so on, but it went nowhere. It went to where the pit had been, where by that time there was only a generating station and a lot of weeds. With other people, I persuaded English Partnerships and Yorkshire Forward to take a risk and build some empty units to see whether we could put jobs there. About 10 years later, I am delighted to say that there are more than 2,000 jobs on that site, and 300,000 sq ft of properties have been developed there. It is a fantastic success for the area.

A local entrepreneur, Mr. Ian Cushnie, who runs a firm called CMS, got a small amount of European regional development fund money, mainly through his own sweat, toil and ingenuity. On a site in the centre of Featherstone, he built eight industrial units, most of which are now filled, and a large warehouse. We have also had £2.2 million awarded to the Chesney centre, which contains some small starter units for small businesses, office space and facilities for training and community development. I am sure that you have seen plenty of that sort of thing in the area that you represent, Mr. Cummings.

To show that we have excellence in the local economy, I shall mention Copley's farm shop. Not everybody might imagine that there could be a farm shop of great excellence in a former colliery village such as Featherstone, but Copley's, a small family business that I believe was started only five years ago, now employs 22 people. It has been so successful that it has been acknowledged by Claridge's, of all places, as the best farm shop in the country. That proves the excellence of the local staff and work force. I do not know whether you have ever been to Claridge's, Mr. Cummings. I certainly have not, but I might well go. If you are ever passing Hemsworth or Featherstone, you would be more than welcome to come to Copley's farm shop.

We have been busy trying to create jobs in the Featherstone area, but questions remain. What kind of jobs are being created? How many of the 2,000 or so people in jobs on Green lane live in Featherstone and how many have been brought in from outside? There is not enough of a link between the new jobs and the employment of the people who live in the area. I see from the statistics that the number of people living in Featherstone who are, unfortunately, on income support is 50 per cent. higher than the average for the country. That tends to indicate that the new jobs that have come do not pay very well and may not be of the same quality as those that existed when the coal mines were open. We need to think about that.

The second issue that I wish to mention is education, which in many ways is the key in coalfield areas. As you know, Mr. Cummings, levels of educational attainment in those areas vary. In the Wakefield area, of which Featherstone is part, a significantly lower than average number of people in the working population have level 3 qualifications. It is important that that educational deficit be addressed so that we can overcome the problems of low pay and of poor access to the employment opportunities that the new economy is creating. In particular, the deficit reflects the poor skills base among young people who are not in education, employment or training—the so-called NEET group. The proportion of young people not in any of those three categories is higher in Featherstone than in many other places. That is why we have put a lot of work into ensuring that there is investment in education in the area. I have mentioned the £2.2 million awarded to Chesney's, where there is adult education.

Almost all the primary schools in the area have had significant additional funding in the past 10 years, but I shall focus on high schools to show how much the Government have invested in the Featherstone area. St. Wilfrid's, which is a Catholic school in north Featherstone, has benefited from £6.25 million for major refurbishment and remodelling, and it draws in people from a wider area than just Featherstone. Featherstone high school, which has now become Featherstone technology college, has received even more money. There was a major refurbishment costing £2 million when it became a technology college, a new sports centre cost £3 million, upgrading the existing facilities cost £500,000, securing technology college status cost £250,000 and a new swimming pool cost £1.3 million. Altogether, about £7.33 million was spent on the campus. That is a demonstration of the confidence that both the Government and the local council, Wakefield metropolitan district council, have in the future of Featherstone. They are optimistic that Featherstone has a promising future.

[Jon Trickett]

As I said, £7.33 million has been spent on Featherstone technical college and a further £6.2 million at St. Wilfrid's school. The technology college, which is the former high school, is repaying every year the confidence that the Government had in it. Every year, we are seeing better results than it was able to achieve the year before. We have broken records at the college in terms of the number of young people achieving exam passes. This year, we expect to get to about 38 per cent. of students—I think that that is the figure—achieving five GCSEs, including maths and English. If so, it will be another record-breaking year and it will be thanks to the brilliant leadership of the head teacher, Stuart Wilson, together with the staff, parents and obviously the young people themselves in producing these fantastic results. After all, education and training is the way for people to take advantage of the new economy being created in our country.

Along with jobs and education, the third area that I wanted to mention is housing. When the Conservatives left office and Labour took over, a great deal of the council housing stock was in disrepair. Many council houses—indeed, most houses in the country—had been left unfit after 18 years of Conservative Administration. It is true to say that Wakefield, which previously had been a series of smaller urban district councils and rural councils, had always looked after its properties, but the fact is that, after all those years, much needed to be done.

Since the council housing went into Wakefield and District Housing, which is run by Kevin Dodd, £14 million has been spent on housing in Featherstone alone, putting right the effects of the many years of neglect. It is true to say that that work has been done rapidly. Occasionally the workmen have perhaps focused on getting the work done as quickly as possible, and from time to time that has caused irritation and frustration for the householder involved. However, when the work is finished, it is fantastic for the householder to have heating, a new kitchen, new electricity supply and all the other things that are being fitted. Clearly, £14.3 million is a huge amount of money.

There is also a master plan for the town that proposes the building of new housing. As we know, the nation as a whole needs much more new housing. Certainly, it would be welcomed by many people in Featherstone if some new housing was to be built in the town, to increase the housing mix. We are very interested to see how that construction process develops.

There is one very dark black spot in housing in Featherstone, which is the former Coal Board houses on Girnhill lane. As I am sure you know, Mr. Cummings, when the pits were closed, Mrs. Thatcher and the Coal Board decided to sell off the Coal Board houses and they were duly sold off. The houses on Girnhill lane were in need of serious remedy; in effect, they had been built with structural defects. They were sold off to a variety of different landlords. Sometimes they were sold off to the council; quite often, colliers who might have saved a bit of money—redundancy money or whatever—then bought their own house and that was a source of great pride for them. For example, I think of George Harrison, who lives on Girnhill lane, who has built a wonderful house there and put an enormous amount of love and attention into it, as have his wife and the rest of his family. However, it is sad to see the extent to which the estate has degraded, to the point where radical action must now be taken.

Three different Ministers have visited Girnhill lane with me: Charlie Falconer, or Lord Falconer as I had better describe him in this place; Lord Rooker, and the current Minister for Local Government, my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (John Healey), who visited when he was a Treasury Minister. All three of them were shocked at the state of Girnhill lane. The council has made money available—about £5 million so far—but when the few people who are still living there look around them, they say, "It cannot possibly be true that they have spent £5 million in Girnhill lane, John, because where has it gone? And how come it has taken so long?"

I must say that I am very frustrated indeed and I understand the anger of the people who live on Girnhill lane that we have not seen further action. However, the truth is that, because Mrs. Thatcher split up the Coal Board estate into so many little parcels of land, it has taken ages to reassemble the estate, buying each small parcel of land to establish an overall development. One landlord owned probably half the estate in the area, but lived in South Africa. It was very difficult to contact him or negotiate a price with him. The negotiations with him went on far too long, in my opinion; we might have used a compulsory purchase order against him some time before we did. The process took a long time and it was very frustrating. I feel frustrated and sometimes angry about it, and certainly the people who live in Girnhill lane do, and rightly so.

The land assembly has been more or less completed now at Girnhill lane. We want to proceed with the construction of 220 new houses, which is a very exciting prospect indeed. However, the time for waiting or for meetings behind closed doors in the council or regional offices is over; I want to see action now in Girnhill lane and I know that the people who live there feel that even more strongly than I do.

If we are not careful, however, all the work on housing that I am talking about will pass the local people by, because workmen will come in, do the work and then move on. I would like to see some of this house building that I have mentioned linked by training to apprenticeships for many of the young people in the area who are looking for stable future employment. Why should such apprenticeships not be in a building trade, given all the housing that will be built in the area?

Briefly, I want to touch on the several issues that still need to be addressed. First, the supermarket deserted the town and left just an empty building there. Without a supermarket, the town centre is not in a healthy state and the local traders desperately want some form of regeneration for it. If necessary, the public sector, including the Government, needs to say, "We will make a supermarket happen there." That happened in Hemsworth; we got Tesco to come and that Tesco supermarket is part of the regeneration of that town. A similar process must happen in Featherstone.

I would also like to see linkage between all the jobs at Green lane that I mentioned and the rest of the town. At the moment, Green lane is a dead-end road: people drive in off the M62 to work there; there is a cul-de-sac, and then there is the town, 50 yards further away. I would like to see a linkage between the two roads, so that some of the money and economic activity in Green lane spills out into the rest of Featherstone. I have already mentioned that much more work needs to be done on housing, and I will not repeat that.

Featherstone is a sporting town. No doubt, Mr. Cummings, you will know a great deal about Featherstone Rovers, which is a very famous and excellent rugby club that is well led and deeply ingrained in the local community. It is working with difficult youngsters and others who need help on very exciting projects. The chair of the club is Paul Coventry, who is very dedicated both to the rugby club itself and to its integration into the town, as are the other directors. However, there are many other sporting activities in the town, from the cricket and bowling green to Featherstone Lions, which is an amateur rugby league club. All those sporting activities and organisations ought to be brought together on to a campus somehow, so that we can have a sense of sporting excellence right in the middle of Featherstone.

Finally, there are the highway problems: poor highways are one of the main problems that we have in Featherstone. There is huge congestion, with people driving backwards and forwards, often bypassing Featherstone. The obstructions and difficulties with local highways are causing real problems. We have a plan for a south-east link road, which would begin to alleviate some of those problems.

All of those ideas are being brought together. I have said that there has been about £30 million of investment over the last 10 years in the Featherstone area, but there is more to do. There is a master plan for the town and an urban renaissance document, but they must not be reduced to subjects for a shallow talking shop. I want action, and so do the people of Featherstone. That is why I support the proposition that Featherstone should become a coalfield action partnership area. The primary agencies—the Coalfield Regeneration Trust, Yorkshire Forward, English Partnerships and Wakefield metropolitan district council—should come together urgently to ensure that a coalfield action partnership is agreed and that it proceeds.

I have discussed all those matters with my hon. Friend the Minister and Cabinet Ministers. The subject has been discussed at the highest levels. I want the Government to move from talking to the action that is required. I press my hon. Friend the Minister to commit the Government to working with me and others to ensure that Featherstone is successfully integrated into the economic success story that we are seeing elsewhere in west Yorkshire.

1.20 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Iain Wright): As ever, it is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Cummings, especially as you are my parliamentary next-door neighbour. I should imagine that you were interested in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett), given that you represent a similar area.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate and on his excellent speech. For many years he has been tireless in raising in this House and with Ministers and officials the subject of regeneration and housing renewal in his constituency, including the Girnhill estate in Featherstone that he discussed today. His passion for promoting jobs, education and housing in the former mining communities that he represents and for improving his constituents' quality of life is a testimony to his commitment to his constituency and to his strong representation and leadership of his local area.

In the time available to me, I would like to respond to my hon. Friend's contribution by covering three broad areas. First, I would like to set out the benefits that this Government have achieved through housing regeneration and what the future challenges are. Secondly, I would like to set out what we are doing to support former mining communities going through change, in particular in Wakefield and Featherstone itself. Thirdly, I shall address some of the specific issues that my hon. Friend raised about regeneration of the Girnhill estate.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, since coming to power in 1997, we have reversed the legacy of decades of under-investment in housing. We have made significant inroads into the £19 billion backlog of repairs to social housing that we inherited. In his region, the number of non-decent homes has fallen by more than 150,000 since 1997. That is improving living conditions and people's quality of life, and contributing to sustainable communities where people now want to live.

Through the housing market renewal programme, for which I have ministerial responsibility, we are giving significant support to those areas in the west midlands and the north, including parts of Wakefield—I have visited the area—that were hit hardest by the decline of traditional industries and which need to tackle problems of severe market failure. We are seeing real progress in those areas. As the National Audit Office found last year, all pathfinder areas have started to close the price gap in their region, and there have been substantial physical improvements in many neighbourhoods.

However, we recognise that more needs to be done, as my hon. Friend said. That is why last year we announced £10.2 billion of regional housing resources nationally for 2008 to 2011. Yorkshire and the Humber is set to benefit from £559 million of that. Compared with last year, that is a 32 per cent. increase in funding in my hon. Friend's region by 2010-11. We have set the region a challenging target for delivery of additional affordable housing, but there will also be a high level of expenditure on improving existing housing and on regeneration projects. In addition, we have been able to announce a further £1 billion investment in the housing market renewal programme over the next three years. That includes a planned £203 million for Yorkshire and the Humber, of which £12 million is planned for coalfield settlements in parts of Wakefield.

[Mr. Iain Wright]

We are facing new challenges to build much-needed new homes and to tackle problems of affordability in all our communities. It is important, however, that in areas of the north we balance growth alongside regeneration and continue to focus our efforts on areas with deep-seated structural problems, such as the mining communities my hon. Friend represents.

I am well aware, as are you, Mr. Cummings, of the impact on mining communities of the demise of the mining industry. My constituency, too, has felt the impact of industrial change with the decline of shipbuilding and heavy manufacturing industry. As my hon. Friend knows, many proud, hard-working families have faced real hardship and have needed support to adapt to the changing social and economic landscapes emerging in such areas. That is why, through support of the Coalfield Regeneration Trust since 1999, we have invested more than £1 million in the Featherstone ward and more than £2.3 million in Hemsworth as a whole. As my hon. Friend said several times today, he is leading the calls for Featherstone to be identified as a coalfield action area for future investment. I am sure that he will be extremely successful in that.

None of that support and investment can work without local leadership and strong partnership working. To be frank, and to embarrass my hon. Friend, one of the things that impresses me about him is his ability to bring together the relevant agencies—Wakefield council, the Coalfield Regeneration Trust, Yorkshire Forward and English Partnerships—and the local community to make the regeneration of Featherstone a high priority for all concerned. My hon. Friend's ambition for his area means that the issue is now being discussed at the highest levels of Government, and it will ensure that a co-ordinated approach is taken to bringing real and sustainable regeneration to Featherstone.

We also need to tackle specific housing market challenges in our mining communities. I believe we would all agree with my hon. Friend that the decision by the former National Coal Board, under the Conservative Government, to dispose of its housing stock had a negative impact on too many mining areas. As he said, many homes were bought by landlords. I have no doubt that many were responsible and had good intentions, but many were speculative, absent, or plain irresponsible and had no regard for good housing management or the feelings of local residents. As a result, as my hon. Friend knows only too well and as I have seen on my own patch, many neighbourhoods fell into decline. Local residents who could simply left, while those left behind often remained in intolerable living conditions.

I have spoken about what we are doing through the housing market renewal programme to turn areas around, but that is not all. For example, through the Yorkshire and Humber Regional Housing Board we have invested £18 million between 2005 and 2008 in the green corridor partnership project to address the issues of former coalfield settlements in south-east Wakefield, Barnsley and Doncaster and to develop quality living environments and sustainable communities. My hon. Friend is far too modest to mention it, but he should take a lot of credit for that initiative, which demonstrates the impact that he can have in Whitehall. It was his invitation to the former Housing Minister, my noble Friend Lord Falconer, which proved to be the necessary catalyst for action to improve those areas.

There is still much to do in the former mining communities. My hon. Friend raised concerns about progress on the Girnhill lane, Featherstone, regeneration project. I would like to say how sorry I was to hear about some of the problems that are emerging on that estate. It must be extraordinarily distressing to live on the estate in its current condition. I look to the council, the police and other appropriate agencies to ensure the effective management of the estate while it goes through change, and to ensure that the remaining residents can live safely in their homes.

As my hon. Friend said, the council is considering compulsory purchase action in Girnhill. I know that he, on behalf of his constituents, is somewhat impatient at the pace of that development. However, he will recognise that it would be wrong of me to comment on the specific detail of the regeneration scheme, as it may prejudice any future quasi-legal decision by the Secretary of State.

In conclusion, I again pay tribute to my hon. Friend's work on behalf of his constituents in respect of regeneration, employment, training, jobs and housing. I am sorry that I am somewhat restricted in saying more about the prospects of impending compulsory action, but I am sure my hon. Friend understands that restriction. I am confident that with his strong local leadership and his ability to bring people together, a satisfactory resolution can be found soon to enable the Girnhill regeneration to proceed. I hope that I have reassured him that this Government are committed to supporting mining communities such as Featherstone and Girnhill in his area and elsewhere through change, including turning around housing market failings where they exist.

11.29 am

Sitting suspended.

Powers of Attorney

1.30 pm

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): I appreciate the opportunity to have this debate, which I welcome, as do a number of my constituents. I also appreciate the Minister's attending.

Abuse of the elderly, which we might perhaps narrow to financial abuse of the elderly, is often considered to be a stranger danger. In the media, people tend to read about cowboy builders who take advantage of older people, rogue traders, phoney charities and various get-rich-quick schemes that attempt to draw older people in and sometimes—although perhaps it is not abuse to the same degree—even mis-selling by normally reputable financial institutions. However, a form of abuse that is far less discussed is abuse that happens nearer to home.

Family and friends are often the greatest risk to older people, sometimes out of weakness and sometimes from a lack of understanding or a lack of respect. Obviously, older people who are subject to dementia or any kind of mental frailty are among the most vulnerable. I suspect that the Minister will be familiar with statistics put together by Action on Elder Abuse and other groups, including Age Concern, for example, which essentially show that dementia affects one in 20 people over 65 and one in five of those over 80. Some 750,000 people with dementia live in England and Wales at the current time.

As we all live longer, the number of people suffering from dementia in the United Kingdom is expected to rise to an astonishing £1.8 million by 2050. Many of those people will have more resources. In the past, old age has tended to be associated with poverty, but with more households comprising two earners and with many people—certainly, those of our generation—benefiting from the rise in the value of their homes, elderly people often have substantial resources, much of which they have saved through programmes and plans with the intention that those should provide for them in their old age.

The Action on Elder Abuse research paper, "The cost of living: growing up is free, growing old is expensive", reports that most victims of financial abuse are women over 81 and that most perpetrators are sons and daughters of those people, aged 41 to 60. Given that information, hon. Members can sense how sensitive, complex and difficult this issue is. However, I want to focus on a yet narrower area of financial abuse of older people: the potential to abuse power of attorney and the difficulties in challenging the way in which those powers are used.

Some recent cases have been mentioned in the newspapers. Let me open with one, after which I shall talk about the experience of one of my constituents. The Daily Telegraph on 12 June, just a week or so ago, reported that a Mrs. Garbutt was murdered. I am not suggesting that most cases end that way, but the court heard, in the general description of what had happened in the family context, that Mrs. Garbutt's daughter "had been granted power of attorney over Mrs. Garbutt's savings of approximately £100,000 and had withdrawn and transferred substantial sums".

The case that drew my attention to this subject was mentioned to me by a constituent of mine. Perhaps if I say a little bit about that case it will give some sense of its scope and dimension. I shall not use names because although some family members are willing to be identified not all are. I think that the relevant Department is well aware of the case. In this instance, the underlying issue is perhaps the most common one: an alleged conflict of interest where a relative who is the attorney under the old enduring power of attorney system and is in a position to make significant decisions about the life of an older person, particularly the way in which their money is spent, is also the executor and sole heir under the will. The case was brought to my attention by a stepdaughter of the elderly lady concerned: she was not a blood relative and not an heir and had no intention of making any claim on the estate, but had, because of ties of family, spent time visiting this older lady, caring for her and advocating for her welfare on her behalf to nursing homes and others.

As I suggested earlier, the victims of this kind of abuse often are not one's typical picture of the impoverished and vulnerable. This older lady had enjoyed a successful career in the world of finance and her estate in old age was considerable and indeed bolstered by a good pension and income from a trust. She was, in her active professional life, profiled in major national publications and was once quoted as saying, "I appreciate the things that money can buy." In other words, she lived life well when young and in her prime and she intended to live life well, having ensured, as her deceased husband had done, that the resources were available to her.

The lady was diagnosed as being in the early stages of Alzheimer's and although for a while she continued to live independently, it was evident to relatives that her dementia was taking a rapid toll, although her physical health remained excellent. Two years after the diagnosis, suddenly and to the surprise of most of her relatives, she signed an enduring power of attorney giving power to her closest blood relative, and within a matter of hours was removed to a care home. Shortly afterwards, she made further alterations to her will. The EPA was registered with the Office of the Public Guardian, but not for another two years. Therefore, there was a two-year period in which, in a sense, this lady is supposed to have been in full charge of her mental capacity. Yet, as far as I understand it, there are serious questions about whether that is true. Indeed, in that period she was moved between homes because the home that she had been placed in initially was unable to cope with the severity of her dementia.

Immediately, we have two questions. First, we need to find out whether this lady was capable of signing the EPA in the first place. Secondly, we have to try to account for the delay in registration, given her condition.

The lady was moved through a couple of nursing homes, but she finally ended up in a comfortable but expensive facility with a specialist dementia unit, where she did reasonably well. The family's general understanding was that she had found a suitable place in which to get the necessary care. That home was expensive, but was well within the capacity of her substantial estate.

The circumstances of the case are disputed by the different sides, because five years later the lady was abruptly removed, under instructions from the attorney, to a far less expensive facility, which at the time had no specialist dementia registration. It later acquired such registration, but from what I have read I doubt that it would have described itself as a care home that specialised in dealing with dementia. My constituent saw her stepmother deteriorate quite rapidly: dramatic weight loss, a series of falls, loss of memory, and physical deterioration, including serious infections requiring hospitalisation. Within 18 months she was bed-bound and within two years she died.

[Susan Kramer]

One may dispute the issues of the case, but my constituent, who had absolutely no financial or other interest in the will or the way in which resources were disposed of, sought to find ways of challenging the care that her stepmother was receiving. She sought advice from the Court of Protection, but all the responses indicated that if she brought a successful challenge she would not be financially at risk, whereas if there were any question about the challenge or she was not successful, she would face severe legal costs. As she pointed out to me, to expect people who may not be the closest blood relative to put themselves at such a risk is unrealistic, so the opportunities for challenge are extremely limited.

My constituent was extremely persistent, and finally persuaded the Office of the Public Guardian to arrange for a Lord Chancellor's visitor to visit the lady, but the process was so extenuated, so long drawn out and so delayed that it occurred only about six weeks before she died.

The Minister will be aware of articles, for example in The Daily Telegraph on 31 May 2008, about the general logjam, but I do not know whether people understand that it extends to this aspect of the Office of the Public Guardian's work. It does not apply just to legal processing, and there seems to be an inherent delay in following up any monitoring and investigation. That is inexcusable when people are in the last years of their lives. My constituent has been informed by the Court of Protection and the OPG that following the death of her stepmother they have no jurisdiction to proceed with their inquiry. She has been told that the matter has effectively been closed by the death of her stepmother.

Many of the problems in this case are associated with enduring power of attorney, which I accept has been replaced by lasting power of attorney, but EPAs in existence prior to October 2007 are still in effect under the old arrangements. I am anxious for the Minister to provide some clarity on how legacy EPAs are being monitored. She will be aware that, according to the charity Action on Elder Abuse, when plans to change to lasting powers of attorney became clear, there was a rush to sign up EPAs ahead of the deadline. They were less costly and many solicitors, unfortunately, advised clients to sign under the old system, and relatives who may have been aware of the differences between the regimes may have encouraged the same. I understand that. The reason for changing the system—which runs counter to the notion of people rushing to sign up—was general concern about whether the person signing was capable of understanding the consequences and delays in registration. I understand that under that system there are no penalties for non-registration, so it is ineffectual.

I have asked the Department whether anyone has ever been deregistered for power of attorney. If they have, no one is aware of it because the information does not seem to be available to anyone, which is somewhat alarming. I should be interested to know whether there really is absolutely no knowledge of whether anyone has ever been deregistered. That would be extraordinary.

EPAs have been ripe for all kinds of abuse. The Minister will remember that the barrister, Tom Dumont, in an article in 2001 on "The Misuse of Enduring Powers of Attorney" estimated that about 15 per cent. of EPAs may be abused, or more than 100,000 at any one time. He pointed out that few financial institutions have any meaningful training on EPAs or the concerns about unregistered EPAs. The system exists in name, but not in practice.

I accept that lasting power of attorney is an improvement on the old EPA system because it provides a more rigorous certification and registration process. However, it is far from iron-clad, and we must recognise that in the past doctors and solicitors were hesitant to step into family relationships and to suggest that a power of attorney might be inappropriate or that the wrong person was being given power of attorney. Certificates of capacity are now required, but solicitors, doctors and friends are still hesitant to interfere in family relationships and are unlikely to challenge whether someone's mental capacity suggests that they are capable of even a lasting power of attorney. The safeguards have increased, but the underlying flaw that people are hesitant to challenge family relationships remains deeply embedded in the system.

We are aware that LPAs can have much greater scope than the old EPAs. In the situation that I described, it was clear that an EPA was being used to make decisions about welfare as well as finance. It is hard to unravel the two, but that is now formalised in the new lasting power of attorney because it can be made to extend to personal welfare.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us what monitoring should take place post-registration—the whole focus seems to be on the registration process rather than on registration followed by ongoing monitoring—and whether the new system will offer better opportunities for external challenge. I cannot see that that will be real while the threat of heavy legal costs remains.

On education, most people are not introduced to the notion of power of attorney until they are frail, which is probably the worst time to have to understand it. Surely, more effective mechanisms should be available to advise people, for example, that they may appoint more than one attorney, that they could include an independent non-beneficiary, and that they could set out preferences and guidance in a more substantial way. That issue does not seem to have been taken up with the legal profession or any other body.

As the Minister will be aware from yesterday's article in The Daily Telegraph, headed, "Whitehall blamed for elderly dying before financial affairs are sorted", the new lasting power of attorney mechanism has hit a logjam. I am sure that she will tell us about resources to relieve that logjam. Many others, like me, are concerned that the anxiety to get through the logjam does not lead to a quick dusting over of the registration process. That would defeat the whole point of having made the changes.

It is obviously necessary to ensure that there is an effective mechanism for power of attorney for people as they become older, but surely as the number of older people increases, particularly of those with substantial financial resources, we must look beyond registration and put in place better monitoring and an education mechanism. Perhaps there should be greater and more stringent requirements on solicitors to set out the options as people start to consider whether they should enter a power of attorney, and how they could be framed. We must have a special programme in place to deal with the legacy of the old EPAs, which will continue to have an impact on the lives of so many people today.

1.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Justice (Bridget Prentice): I congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) on securing this debate on an important and serious issue, and on getting under the wire so that we can have this discussion.

I intended to open my remarks with an outline of the importance of what we have put in place in the Mental Capacity Act 2005, but because of the time I hope that you will forgive me, Mr. Cummings, if I do not go into such detail. The hon. Lady has accepted that the 2005 Act and its attendant changes have been an improvement, and I shall refer to it only in passing, if necessary. If I do not cover anything that the hon. Lady has raised, I shall write to her in more detail.

The hon. Lady raised the possibility that vulnerable adults could be at risk from those with power of attorney over their affairs. The Mental Capacity Act 2005 was implemented last October and changed the way in which attorneys operate. She has also tabled a written question about the number of times the Court of Protection has suspended an individual's power of attorney, and she made reference to that in her remarks. I said then that it might be possible to produce further data and that I would write to her with the results of that exercise. At the time, we did not have the information available. I can tell her that although that information has been difficult to collate, I am pleased to say that we now have some information on the number of objections to the registration of powers and the outcomes of those cases.

From 1 April 2004 to 30 September 2007—before the 2005 Act was implemented—there were just over 1,500 objections to the registration of an EPA, of which 621, or 40 per cent., were not registered. In the first six months of operation from October 2007, the new Court of Protection received 425 objections to registration of a power of attorney. Many of those cases are not yet completed, but the court has currently suspended one power, cancelled or revoked the power in 17 cases and has directed the Office of the Public Guardian not to register three others. I will write to the hon. Lady with further results of that analysis. To some extent, that answers some of her questions. At least under the new system, the powers are being looked at more vigorously and with far greater scrutiny, and action is being taken either directly by the Court of Protection or by the Office of the Public Guardian.

Let me return now to the broader theme. The 2005 Act provides a clear, statutory framework to empower and protect people who lack the capacity to make decisions for themselves. However, it requires steps to be taken to allow the person to make those decisions or to have the fullest input into any decision that is made. When a decision is made on their behalf, it is necessary that it is in their best interests and restricts their rights and freedoms as little as possible.

The 2005 Act created a new Court of Protection with an expanded jurisdiction that covers health and welfare matters in addition to financial decisions. The court can appoint a deputy to manage a person's affairs. In addition, the Act also created a statutory public guardian responsible for maintaining registers of powers of attorney and supervising deputies appointed by the court. The Office of the Public Guardian also has powers to investigate allegations of abuse made against attorneys or deputies.

The 2005 Act also changed how powers of attorney operate to provide greater flexibility in the way in which they can be used and to increase the protections surrounding them. The Lord Chancellor issued a code of practice under the Act so that certain groups of people, such as attorneys, are under a legal obligation to have regard to the code when making decisions. An attorney's failure to comply with the code can be used as evidence in any proceedings that may be brought before a court or tribunal.

There is also a new criminal offence of abuse or neglect of a person who lacks capacity. That covers those caring for such a person, or those appointed as their attorney or deputy. The offence carries a maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment, or a fine, or both so that it is not seen by the courts as a relatively small offence; it is seen as a relatively serious offence, and rightly so.

The case that the hon. Lady highlighted—I am aware of it but we will not go into any details—was made under the old system of the enduring power of attorney. It gave a person the authority to manage someone else's property and financial affairs. As the hon. Lady said, under that system, EPAs could be used, quite legally, to manage a person's affairs while that person still had capacity without any need for the power to be registered. They were required to register only once the donor had lost the capacity to manage their affairs.

Clearly, the difficulty with that system was that it allowed unscrupulous attorneys to use an unregistered EPA to access a person's finances or manage their property, and to do that without anyone's knowledge. As a consequence, it was also very difficult to estimate the total number of EPAs in existence and, worse than that, how many of them were being used fraudulently. We are very conscious of that issue, both in the Department and in the Office of the Public Guardian. We cannot give the hon. Lady a figure on the number of unregistered EPAs. She referred to the scramble by solicitors to encourage people to use EPAs before October. Those solicitors should have looked more closed at the Mental Capacity Act and realised the benefits of a lasting power of attorney. I know that it costs more, but it gives people far more control over their own affairs and far more control to the Office of the Public Guardian over the way in which people behave. Almost 40,000 EPAs have been registered in the past couple of years. We have to assume that the number of unregistered EPAs is significantly higher than that.

It is extremely difficult to make any accurate assumptions on the possible levels of abuse of the old system. However, the previous Master of the Court of Protection, now a senior judge of the new court, felt that as many as 5 to 10 per cent. of registered EPAs were possibly being used fraudulently. That included relatively low-level abuses, such as inflated claims for travel expenses.

[Bridget Prentice]

Nevertheless, that is not an insignificant number. More worrying, however, is the level of abuse of unregistered EPAs.

It was against that background that the 2005 Act reformed the system to provide greater protection. That means that before a person can have their lasting power of attorney registered, they have to comply with safeguards connected with that registration before the attorney can use them. The Office of the Public Guardian will be able to build up a much greater knowledge of the number of valid powers in circulation. Also, a person will be asked by the public guardian to name up to five people whom they wish to be notified when they make an application for an LPA to be registered. There will then be a statutory six-week waiting period during which objections to registration can be made. Only after that will the Office of the Public Guardian register the power.

Finally, when making an LPA, an independent person must provide a certificate confirming that the person making the LPA has the capacity to make it and is not subject to undue pressure. An additional certificate must be provided if the donor has not named anyone to be notified upon registration of the power. I hope that that answers one of the hon. Lady's later questions about what is in place now to monitor and scrutinise what happens.

In the very brief time that I have left, I will describe what happens when there are concerns about the behaviour of the attorney. It will be for the Office of the Public Guardian to investigate in the first instance. Since last October, there has been a dedicated compliance and regulation team responsible for considering all the allegations brought to the attention of the Office of the Public Guardian. As a result of those, the office may approach the police, or any other relevant agencies, if it considers it appropriate. When there are serious concerns about personal welfare by attorneys or deputies, the office will always liaise with the relevant agencies. It is in the process of agreeing a protocol to outline the circumstances in which it will seek to involve those agencies.

While it is not appropriate for me to comment on the individual case that the hon. Lady mentioned—the way in which that case was dealt with is deeply unfortunate—I hope that I have given in general terms some of the ways in which the new system will benefit people in the future.

It being Two o'clock, the sitting was adjourned without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 18 June 2008

[MR. CHRISTOPHER CHOPE in the Chair]

Parliamentary Representation (England)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mark Tami.]

9.30 am

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair this morning, Mr. Chope. It is four years since the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs, the body that is supposed to represent English MPs, has met. We do not have a Grand Committee like the Welsh, Northern Irish or Scottish. The English do not have Secretaries of State, Assemblies or Parliaments. The English have something that has rarely met since 1997: the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs. That is the best that we can do for the largest proportion of voters and the largest number of constituency MPs. That is not appropriate.

Today, I shall make some radical proposals for the long-term reform of the British constitution and public finances. They will set me at odds with the policy of my Government and party, but I am convinced that standing still is not an option. The present arrangements are producing growing resentment all over the United Kingdom, particularly in England. I hope that my party will not trap itself by defending the status quo for ever, as that would put the future of the United Kingdom at risk.

This debate has a simple theme. My constituents are living in a half-finished house that costs them money, and they are beginning to resent it. The half-finished house in our country—the United Kingdom—has, like so many historic houses, grown up over the centuries without a master plan and according to the needs or whims of successive owners. Nearly 90 years ago, after a long and bitter dispute, we gave the neighbouring property to its sitting tenants—although some preferred to go on living with us. We spent the next 70 years or so trying to improve our house to make it a better place in which to live and trying to protect it from outside attack. We made no changes to the structure of the house and all the rooms and facilities were shared among all the residents.

However, in the past 10 years, there has been some major remodelling of the property. We converted the upstairs into a separate flat for the Scots and created another flat with inferior facilities in the west wing for the Welsh. We then persuaded the Northern Irish to live in another flat in the orangery—although many of them wanted to live with their neighbours next door. All that remodelling failed to create any special space for the English. They went on living in the property, but the Scots, the Welsh and the Northern Irish were still free to walk in and help themselves to the fridge and the drinks cabinet. They could even make rules for the English that they themselves did not have to follow. Meanwhile, the English went on paying most of the household bills.

More and more of the English, including many of my constituents, are finding that an uncomfortable way to live. They put up with it when there was plenty of money coming into the house, but now that money is scarcer and outgoings are rising, they are beginning to question it. I propose some restructuring of the property, so that we can all live in the way that we want to without imposing on one another. I am also calling for a fair and transparent system of meeting the household bills. That will entail replacing the Barnett formula, which, as we know, was intended to be a temporary expedient that would last six months. However, the formula still regulates the financial relationships between the separate devolved entities of the United Kingdom. Our household settles its accounts through arrangements that were set up in the 1970s for reasons that no one can remember and with results that no one can understand.

Our present constitutional settlement creates anomalies and inequalities. The people of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have acquired distinct powers over key public services and other matters that are denied to the English. Scottish, Welsh and Northern Irish MPs can vote for policies that apply only to the English and that they have never sought for their own constituents. Despite the recent reduction in the number of Scottish MPs, there are distinct disparities in the value of votes in general elections between different parts of the United Kingdom. The Library note on this debate points out that a Scottish elector's vote is worth 8 per cent. more than an English one, a Northern Irish vote is worth 13 per cent. more and a Welsh vote is worth 21 per cent. more. Where is the equity in that system?

The people of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have used their new powers, particularly in health and education, to make their experience and entitlements notably different from those of the English. Those are funded by a complex and opaque system of financial transfers. To the English at least, it appears that the other parts of the United Kingdom are being shielded from the full financial consequences of their decisions, for example in relation to free personal care for the elderly. In the measured words of Professor James Mitchell of Strathclyde university:

> "the current situation in which the Scottish Parliament provides more generous public policies than elsewhere without having to pay the additional cost is leading to a problem of legitimacy in England."

Before going further, I would like to thank Dominic Webb of the Library's economic policy and statistics section for two papers of great clarity on the murky subject of the Barnett formula. I have also drawn on the work of David Heald of the university of Sheffield and Alasdair McLeod of the university of Aberdeen.

The financial relationships between the nations of the United Kingdom were created haphazardly and with the minimum of public debate. Money is transferred directly in outright grants to the devolved Administrations. Those grants are strongly influenced by the Barnett formula, which automatically allocates increases in public expenditure to Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland on the basis of their population. Money is also transferred indirectly by the operation of the UK-wide tax and social security system and through public spending on UK-wide public services, such as defence and diplomacy. Official statistics give us some information about the first of those indirect transfers, but not the second.

[Derek Wyatt]

Finally, money is removed from the United Kingdom by the European Union and partially returned to each of its different regions.

Turning to the Barnett formula, it is universally agreed that no one expected it to last this long—certainly not its author Joel Barnett who is in another place. He did not even know that it had been named after him and it was not mentioned in his memoirs. We have only debated the Barnett formula twice since 1997—once when I initiated a debate in 2001 and once recently. I welcome the commitment of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to publish a paper on the Barnett formula in the near future, as a contribution to the Calman commission on Scottish devolution. However, as an English Member, I am concerned about the commission's terms of reference. For a start, it is a Scotland-only review and it will not look at the impact of financial transfers to Wales or Northern Ireland, still less at their impact on England. More importantly, the review aims to come up with recommendations

"that would enable the Scottish Parliament to serve the people of Scotland better, that would improve the financial accountability of the Scottish Parliament and that would continue to secure the position of Scotland within the United Kingdom".

The review will be paid for largely by English taxpayers. It is hard to reconcile all those aims.

As many authorities have pointed out, the Barnett formula does not determine the overall size of the grants to Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland; it is a mechanism for increasing those grants automatically. The formula therefore perpetuates favourable settlements that were made years ago. However, that was not its intention; quite the opposite. It was meant to produce convergence in public expenditure per capita in each part of the United Kingdom. That has simply not happened. There is a persistent and widening gap between different countries and regions within the United Kingdom in identifiable per capita public spending. Identifiable public expenditure means that which is directed at a specific country or region, or that which has generated a payment or benefit to its inhabitants. That therefore excludes the UK-wide items that I mentioned earlier. However, it does cover 83 per cent. of all public expenditure.

Let me unfold some of the figures. In 2007-08, identifiable per capita public expenditure for the UK was £7,790 per person. That works out at £7,535 for the English, £8,577 for the Welsh, £9,179 for the Scottish, and £9,789 for the Northern Irish. Out of all the English regions, the south-east does worst. Each of my constituents receives only £6,512 in identifiable public expenditure. My constituency has the fifth and sixth poorest wards in England. I should like an explanation of how it is that we pay the most tax and it is shifted around the regions but not spent in my constituency. That is undemocratic and unfair. To rub salt in the wound, the south-east region is also one of the most heavily taxed.

Other hon. Members can dispute the calculations—although they come from the Library—but they explain why my constituents are becoming tired of living in a half-finished house. The time has come to finish the building and complete the billing arrangements for all the people who live there. All the peoples of the United Kingdom should have the same power to shape the laws and services that shape their lives, but they should also have the same responsibility for paying for them.

That is why I propose a new kind of Parliament. I accept that the journey will be tortuous and argumentative. Therefore, it cannot be done overnight. I propose a 10-year constitutional convention, at the end of which, I would hope, we would agree to four separate lower Parliaments representing England, Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland. Each would have the same powers. The budgets of the four lower chambers would be settled by those Parliaments. There would not be an income tax for the United Kingdom. There would be an income tax locally; the lower Parliaments would be free to raise income in whatever way they wished to do so, for example by a sales tax.

Why do I say that? I do not have the figures, but since 1945 the Governments of this country, irrespective of party, have spent billions and billions of pounds trying to create wealth in this country. However, in the last year, the only three regions of Britain that are a plus on the Exchequer are the east of England, London and the south-east of England, so even though we have handled massive subsidies relating to the public sector and private sector investment from overseas, we have yet to find the entrepreneurial spirit in many of the regions and nations of this country. We can go on thinking that we can do that, but I remind hon. Members that in China, as one example, the growth rate in the economy this year is 10.6 per cent. That is 10.6 per cent. of what will be the largest economy in the world in 2020. If we care about what is happening in China, India, Russia and Brazil, we have to frame our constitution and the funding of that constitution with a modern way of looking at what is coming over the mountains, especially from India and China.

I am British and proud to be British; I sign into hotel rooms as British. I want to retain the United Kingdom, so the solution for me constitutionally is to place over the four lower chambers an overarching Parliament, whether it is called a senate or a house of representatives, that will bind in the four countries of the United Kingdom. I would abolish the House of Lords. How each chamber voted and what it did would be a matter for the lower houses, but the upper house might deal with issues such as the environment and foreign policy. It would be for the constitutional convention to resolve that.

It would be a long and contentious process to agree the powers and responsibilities. That is why I propose a consensus-building mechanism in the form of the convention, with representatives of all the parties and each nation and region of the United Kingdom. Its deliberations would be in public and published and would be open to online participation by voters.

During its 10-year life, the convention would also take the opportunity to define a relationship between all the chambers and the European Parliament. There is a major problem with the MEPs and the 27 countries. Only in Finland are the MEPs charged with coming back to talk in the Chamber in Helsinki. I think that that is a very good idea. I would like to see MEPs not charging down to Strasbourg every fourth week, but being told to come to their national Parliaments to give an account of what they are doing, so that what happens in Europe matters to us in the national Parliament. There is a grave error in the constitutional way in which Europe works currently.

I would expect the convention, at the end of the 10 years, to come up with a set of proposals for each of the chambers. How they vote and so on is a matter for them. All those proposals should be put to the peoples of the United Kingdom in a referendum. I hope and believe that, at the end of the 10 years, the convention would make our government and finances clear, more 21st century than 19th, with a separation of powers and responsibilities, and revenues understood and endorsed by our citizens in an open and transparent process. In each chamber, every representative and every voter would have equal power. In the UK as a whole, all taxpayers would know where their money was. There would be no hidden transfers, and all taxpayers would have control over the spending of their taxes.

It has been argued that a federal system cannot work in the United Kingdom because England is so dominant in terms of population and economic strength. I disagree with that argument. Whatever system we have, the English will always be bigger—look at the size of the country, the population and the economy. However, we can have a clear separation of powers to allow each nation to create a sphere of influence of its own, escaping the dominance of the English nation at the price of relinquishing any subvention from the English nation. I believe that only a separation of powers will allow the survival of British politics and parties on non-national lines. The real danger is in keeping the status quo.

Of course I accept that my proposals are contentious, but we simply cannot carry on as we are. The present constitutional and financial relationships cannot endure. They are arbitrary and opaque, and allow everyone in the United Kingdom to believe that the system is unfair to them. The resulting mutual resentments will lead, I believe, to the break-up of the country in confusion and acrimony. Unless we introduce a constitutional convention, that will happen.

9.46 am

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It was interesting to listen to the introduction by the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt). He raised some important points that I did not intend to cover, and which I still do not intend to cover because he covered them so well. I am not as certain as he is about the Barnett formula, but I welcome anyone trying to tackle the issue and he is certainly doing that. Perhaps the English would not be worried about paying a little more, as long as they were left to deal with their own money. It is the fact that we both pay money to other countries and spend that money that worries people, particularly in England. However, I will deal now with the issues that I consider most important.

Residents of the Isle of Wight are of a particularly independent frame of mind, but they are certainly not alone in being concerned about the unfairness of the present constitutional framework. Years ago, the West Lothian question was pondered by many, with little hope of the circle ever being squared. Since then, we have seen the installation of a Scottish Parliament, ending the debate about whether Scottish-orientated legislation should be made at Westminster. Now, with the Scottish Parliament established, Stormont set up and Wales coveting complete devolution, where does England fit in? What about the West Wight question?

Retaining a Parliament for United Kingdom-wide legislation is essential. There needs to be one centre of law making for the United Kingdom. We are still, undoubtedly, a united kingdom bound together by centuries of common history, language and culture. That is reflected in how certain matters are administered, and our common heritage should not be forgotten. The devolved Administrations have proved popular. With that in mind, why should we not have a separate institution to deal with English-only matters?

Unlike some, I am not in the business of squabbling over which legislature should have the most power. I merely propose the notion that it may be time to mirror our neighbours' constitutional arrangements for the benefit of England and for the continued existence of the United Kingdom. The belief is now widespread throughout England that the arrangements should be balanced more fairly. The votes of Scottish Members can be marshalled to overturn the views of English Members of this House, as they were on university top-up fees, when Scottish constituents will not be affected. However, Scottish MPs are not properly answerable to their electors on English matters. I believe, along with many others, that it is time to address that fundamental question.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Is not the problem worse than he describes? A Scottish Westminster MP can vote in this place on hospital provision for my hon. Friend's constituents on the Isle of Wight, but not on hospital provision in his or her constituency in Scotland, because it is a devolved matter for the Scottish Parliament. Scottish Westminster MPs can interfere in English affairs, but are not able to interfere in many matters in their own constituencies.

Mr. Turner: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. What is wrong is not that the Scottish here are unable to vote on Scottish matters, but that the Scottish here are voting on what is happening on the Isle of Wight and on other English matters.

The wheels of political evolution will not stop turning. Public concern is increasing and the question of an English Parliament continues to climb further up the agenda. What are we going to do when it reaches the top?

9.52 am

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) not only on obtaining this debate but on his thoughtful and considered contribution. I agree with his central point, that we are dealing with a half-built house—a constitutional settlement that is unfinished. Devolution for Scotland was a political necessity, as it was for Wales, but the structure of the constitution left after devolution was not thought through. That is why I entirely agree with what I take to be the hon. Gentleman's central proposal, which is that a constitutional convention should take place over an extended period to produce a new constitutional settlement that is fairer and clearer for all the people of the United Kingdom.

[David Howarth]

I agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about MEPs and their place in our political life. Their separation from us is one reason for the apparent lack of democracy and democratic legitimacy faced by the European Union. However, although I am not sure how the constitutional convention would end, I am pretty sure that the hon. Gentleman's proposal would be a major runner in the process. I also agree with him that the Barnett formula needs to be reviewed.

There is some public feeling about the West Lothian—or West Wight—question. There is a constitutional anomaly, as the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) said. However, I do not believe that it bothers people much, as evidence from public opinion polls shows. There is an old saying in Hollywood: if someone says to you, "It's not the money, it's the principle," then it is the money. That is the point that needs to be grasped.

It is true that if the Barnett formula were to be properly reviewed, if we rethought its needs basis and considered again precisely where the money should go, it would not necessarily have the dramatic effect that those who call for a review sometimes seem to hope for. In any case, the figures on which the arguments are based are not entirely straightforward. The hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey said that the figures usually cited are based on about 80 per cent. of public expenditure and do not include such things as defence. That is based on the theory that defence, as a service, is for the entire national community. However, that is not quite true when it comes to expenditure, because defence expenditure is rather more specific in particular areas than is the service.

If one considers expenditure by region, it can be seen that London does rather well, even without defence. It comes well up the table on expenditure per head, higher even than Wales. That makes me wonder whether there is a relationship between demand for devolution and how much money can be got from the Government. Many, many years ago, I wrote my first academic article: I studied regional expenditure and policy in the 1970s, and the only useful conclusion that I could draw was that the best predictor of regional expenditure was votes for third parties in the 1974 election. I wonder whether the political structure has now changed slightly, such that, to the extent that there is a demand for regional devolution, one can get money out of central Government. The south-east and the eastern area of the country is my area, and I am a Liberal Democrat in favour of regional devolution, but to be frank there is little demand for it there. Those are the areas that get the least money.

Underlying the comments of the hon. Members for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) and for Kettering—this is slightly less true of the comments of the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey—about where we should go from here and what constitutional arrangements should be put in place is some confusion about the idea of representation. If English MPs were to join together to defend the interests of England as England, there would not be a problem. There are so many of us that we could abuse our position to do whatever we wanted. The problem is not representation in the sense of protecting the interests of our constituents—we are in a strong position to do that as English MPs. The problem is set to arise if Government proposals for specific measures may get through only with the votes of non-English MPs, despite the fact that the measures affect only England. That is a different sort of representation. That is political representation—the representation of political views.

There are several problems with the idea of representation put forward by those who argue for English votes for English laws. The first is that it does not apply all the way down. When Parliament was dealing with the Greater London Authority Act 1999, we did not have votes for London MPs only. When we discuss the Bournemouth Bill, we do not restrict debate to MPs from Bournemouth.

Secondly, from a Liberal Democrat point of view, the most important point is that MPs elected for English constituents are not representative of English political opinion. That is because the electoral system—the first-past-the-post system—is not representative of political opinion in that way. It is difficult for opponents of proportional representation to argue in the way they often do for English votes and laws. Those of us who support PR have less need to worry about the anomaly in the first place. Why? The main argument against PR is that it leads to minority Government, and it is true that that outcome is more frequent than coalitions. However, it is interesting that all the proposals except that made by the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey imply that we could have a UK Government with a majority at UK level, but a minority in England.

Those who propose such an arrangement think that that is all right. In fact, the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind), who has been arguing for what might be called the "English Committee Stage" solution, said in The Scotsman on 23 April this year—an interesting date—that, under his proposal:

> "On entirely English business, the government may not get its way. Some people say the government wouldn't be able to function. That is absolute rubbish. Alex Salmond doesn't have a majority in the Scottish Parliament, but nobody says Scotland is ungovernable."

It is interesting that those who propose such interim solutions to the problem of English representation do so in a way that undermines their simultaneous objection to proportional representation. They cannot have it both ways.

The main argument for the first-past-the-post system is that it exists to elect a Government, not to represent political opinion. That is the clearest argument for the present system. However, if we apply first past the post to the problem of English representation, we must conclude that there must be a separate Government for England, and not simply a separate representative body. Will people find that acceptable? There are some problems with such a solution.

That is also the conclusion if we think about maintaining one United Kingdom Government who also ru ; England. It is perfectly possible, especially under the present arrangements, for a Government to have a majority in the UK, but a minority in England, as I said. However, something far more radically challenging is also perfectly possible: namely, a situation in which a UK Government are formed from a party that is in a minority in England, when another party have a majority in England. That would be an extraordinary situation. Such a Government would face defeat on everything all the time. In fact, the Opposition's position would also be quite extraordinary, because they would have a majority in the legislature for their part of the Kingdom, but no ministerial office or responsibility.

Solutions to the problem that do not include a separate English Government face extraordinary problems of coherence. However, if we look at public opinion and the demands for some sort of solution to the West Lothian question, we see little support for a separate Government, because, as is well known, people are not in favour of creating extra layers of paid politicians. That was one of the main reasons why the referendum on regional devolution in the north-east went the way it did—the idea went down. People do not like the idea of those extra layers.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Gentleman seems to be saying that we must have the same size of Government at UK and England level, but surely England and say, the Conservatives, would deal with two thirds of the matters—perhaps not the most important matters—and the other party would deal with a few important matters, such as defence and the national Exchequer. One lot would be doing something at English level, and some other lot would do other things at UK level.

David Howarth: Those would be two separate Governments. The UK Government would be made up by one party, and a separate English Government by a different party. That would be a proper federal system like Germany's, where Governments at federal level can have different political complexions from those of the Länder.

The question is whether the coherent cure that the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey proposed is worth the disease. At the moment, the proposal seems to be like taking a sledgehammer to crack a nut, even if it is a coherent sledgehammer. The problem is not as great for those of us who support proportional representation, because PR would be far less likely to produce conflicting political results in the first place. First past the post exaggerates political differences and produces exaggerated results in different parts of the country, whereas PR would reduce them. Although contradictory results are not impossible under PR, they are far less likely.

The first priority is proportional representation. The problem we are discussing today is, it seems, a third-term problem. That is helpfully in line with the timetable that the hon. Gentleman proposed for his constitutional convention. I am therefore fully prepared to wait.

10.6 am

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): It is always interesting to hear the Liberal Democrats' arguments for proportional representation. We will never be convinced by them, but we understand exactly why it is always their first priority. If we turn the clock back, we will find that the Liberal party did not stand for PR 100 years ago. Then, they wanted to be in government, but they now know that they will not be in government. They were not in government for most of the last century and they will not be in this century, so we forgive them for always making proportional representation their top priority.

I heartily congratulate the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) on introducing this debate. It is a welcome opportunity to discuss an extremely important matter—I am only sorry that more Members of Parliament do not make it a high priority. I am nevertheless pleased to see that six of us are in the Chamber; what we lose in quantity we make up for, as ever, in quality. The issue must be discussed. I believe that that ought to happen in Government time, but as that has not happened, the hon. Gentleman is to be congratulated on opening the matter up. I am pleased to see the Minister—by my calculations looking at the clock, he will have plenty of time to answer all the matters that have been raised this morning. I will raise only a few more for him.

The hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey was right that this is unfinished business, as it has been for a long time. The issue became known as the West Lothian question, rightly, because the then Member for West Lothian, Mr. Tam Dalyell, brought the subject up again and again in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, when devolution for Scotland was discussed repeatedly in the House of Commons, and finally was put to more than one referendum in Scotland. Mr. Tam Dalyell was right to ask the question and to highlight the anomaly, and no Government have come up with an answer to the West Lothian question. The current Government want to sweep the whole matter under the carpet and have, indeed, successfully done so for 11 years. They have simply refused to address the problem, although I am sure that they would not answer it even if they did. That is simply not fair.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Does my hon. Friend agree that pushing the issue under the carpet for 11 years has made the situation far worse, particularly in some constituencies in England?

Mrs. Laing: Yes. My hon. Friend is correct, and I was about to make precisely that point. The constitution of the United Kingdom is imperfect, and there is an imbalance on this issue, as there is on many others. We do not pretend that our constitution is perfect; what matters, however, is not that it should be a perfect work of academic excellence—we are not looking for a first in constitutional law from Cambridge—but that it should work for the United Kingdom and make the Union work. My top priority is the Union of all the parts of our United Kingdom, and that is what Conservative Members want to see preserved and improved in anything that is done on this issue.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, however, the situation has got worse over the past 11 years, and that is because of the perceived unfairness. Now, I would argue that the unfairness in the constitution and the Barnett formula is not as bad as some people make it out to be; indeed, with all respect to the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey, who argued his case very well, it is not as bad as he calculates it to be. However, we do not know how bad it is, because the Government have not properly considered the matter. As my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) rightly said, therefore, the perception of unfairness has grown. The perception that some parts of the United Kingdom are not getting as good a deal as others has grown, and resentment has grown, too. I would argue that there is no need for that resentment, but it is essential that it is addressed. As the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey correctly said, it cannot be fair that people who are elected to represent Scottish constituencies are making rules for the English that they themselves do not have to follow. That is the worst of the perceived unfairnesses, but the Government have refused to address it.

[Mrs. Laing]

The hon. Gentleman rightly, and most interestingly, analysed the weight of the vote in different parts of the United Kingdom. However, when we elect a Government—to take up the point made by the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth)—we are not trying exactly to represent different people in different parts of the United Kingdom, or indeed in different constituencies; we are generally electing a Government. That takes me back to the idea of the perfection of the constitution. We would have an unworkable Government if we tried to have perfect representation and to ensure that Parliament exactly reflected the proportional make-up of the people of the United Kingdom in economic, ethnic or any other terms that we might care to mention. That simply would not work.

What matters is that we construct a system that works, that is perceived as fair and that gives people in all parts of the United Kingdom the feeling that they are being fairly governed. Indeed, one of the principle rules of constitutional development is that arrangements should not only be fair, but be seen to be fair. That, of course, is why there is now a problem with the Barnett formula, and I am pleased that the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey has given us the opportunity to raise the issue.

Again, the Barnett formula is not as unfair as it is sometimes made out to be. After all, Scotland is not all the same; there are enormous disparities between the industrial belt in central Scotland, the borders and the agricultural areas in the north, just as there are enormous differences in the region called the south-east of England. The hon. Gentleman rightly said that his constituency contains areas that are calculated as deprived, but which, because they are in the south-east, do not necessarily get the financial subsidy that he might hope for. The same is true in my constituency, where some areas are very much in need of greater social, economic and other input, but do not get it because the wider area is not perceived to be in need. Likewise, Scotland is not one homogenous area. The Barnett formula must therefore be calculated in a way that takes all parts of Scotland into consideration. It might be said that Glasgow, for example, equates to the centre of Birmingham, Manchester or Newcastle, but that does not mean that the whole of Scotland equates to the whole of England.

My point is that this is not a simple matter and that it cannot be distilled into simplistic terms. Indeed, I heard Lord Barnett eloquently give evidence to the Select Committee on Justice a few weeks ago. He said—I am not quoting him, but trying to reflect his comments exactly, and I am sure that hon. Members will check what he said in due course—that he had intended to put together a fair funding formula that operated on a needs basis for the different parts of the United Kingdom, and particularly Scotland. He said that it had never worked on a needs basis, however, and that he would like to see it do so. There are ways in which the Barnett formula could be improved without rocking the boat of constitutional reform. Its perceived unfairness is greater than its actual unfairness, although that does not mean that the issue does not have to be addressed—of course it does. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight was absolutely correct in all that he said in that regard.

I take issue with the main premise of the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey. We do not need another Parliament—we have too much government already. As the hon. Member for Cambridge rightly said, and as was decisively evidenced in the referendum in the north-east of England a few years ago, the people do not want more government, more Parliaments or more politicians; they want taxpayers' money to be spent on supporting the people, not Parliaments and politicians—we have quite enough politicians at various levels already. I therefore take issue with the hon. Gentleman's assertion that the answer is a federal system. Why would we want a federal system? Would it be so that it would fit in with the idea of a European superstate or so that the United Kingdom could be divided into bite-sized chunks, ready to be gobbled up by a federal Europe?

Derek Wyatt: The idea of the EU gobbling up England is as far-fetched as I have heard for a while. However, I did not have Europe in mind, but the English. As a result of the discussions in the House over the past 12 years, the English have not been given a fair constitutional settlement.

Mrs. Laing: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has made it clear what he thinks about Europe. I do not believe that the United Kingdom can be gobbled up by Europe or anyone else, but if it is split up into bite-sized chunks, it could be prepared to become part of a federal Europe. That is the last thing that I, or any Conservative Member, would want to see.

David Howarth: A more commonly held view is the one proposed by Professor Vernon Bogdanor at Oxford. He says that the centralisation of power in Europe has the opposite effect within member states. It tends to make those member states less decentralised, and more centralised. What the hon. Lady is saying is the opposite of what appears to be going on.

Mrs. Laing: It is all about perception, is it not? The hon. Gentleman possibly perceives things from a rather different angle from me, but that is what democracy is all about, is it not? In his consideration of the European angle, the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey brought forward a most interesting proposition, which is that Members of the European Parliament should, in some way, be held accountable by their member states. That is an issue that is worth exploring, and I hope that all sides of the House will consider that possibility.

The real problem is the West Lothian question. The fact is that Members of Parliament who are elected to represent constituencies in England should have a decisive say in matters that affect only England. That is the simplest way in which I can put it. There are various ways in which we can make that happen. One of them is the hon. Gentleman's idea of a federal system, which I personally reject. My right hon. and learned Friends the Members for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) and for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) have both, in recent months, proposed very elegant solutions along the lines of an English Grand Committee or a ruling by the Speaker on matters that affect only England. Those ideas should be examined in greater detail and considered for a future Parliament.

Likewise, I expect that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who, along with his commission on the constitution, has been examining the matter in detail for some time, may well propose another similar solution. Such a solution may suggest that giving English Members of Parliament—Members of Parliament who sit for English seats—a decisive say in matters that affect only England can be properly addressed without creating further tiers of government or more bureaucracy than we need and without costing the taxpayer enormous amounts in constitutional reform, but in a way in which the Union is preserved and enhanced. I understand why the Government are so reluctant to discuss this matter and to come forward with their own proposals.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Before my hon. Friend moves on, does she not agree that English Members should be in the House one extra day—or perhaps Scottish, Irish and Welsh Members could be in the House one day fewer—so that we can discuss English matters?

Mrs. Laing: As usual, my hon. Friend has proposed a good and logical solution. It is similar to the possible solutions proposed by my right hon. and learned Friends the Members for Kensington and Chelsea and for Devizes. Although I cannot anticipate what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe will propose, it could be along those lines as well. There are ways in which this matter could partially be put right. We will not have a perfectly balanced constitution, but we could have one that is perceived to be much fairer than it is at present. It is that perceived unfairness that I want to put right—and I want it to be seen to be put right—because the growing resentment within some political movements in England will give rise to English nationalism, which will be just as bad as Scottish nationalism, or any other kind of nationalism, which seeks to divide one set of people from another at a time in our history—and that of the world—when we should be coming together and not looking for divisions. I do not want to see nationalism that draws lines, but a Union that brings people together.

However, I understand why the Government do not wish to discuss the matter. It is because of the 59 seats that come from Scotland—or the 59 Members of this House who are returned from Scotland. At present, 40 of them represent the Labour party, which is a low figure compared with the past 50 or 60 years. It is usually a higher proportion. Therefore, the current Government are terrified of losing 40 votes in matters that they want to push through this House. Naturally enough, they do not want to address the issue, especially as two of those 40 Members are the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I put it to the Minister and the House that if we do not correct the perceived unfairness, then we will allow resentment to grow. That resentment is not good for the constitution or for government. Government should be fair, and I will be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about how this Government propose to correct the perceived unfairness.

10.27 am

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Mr. Michael Wills): It is a pleasure to be here under your distinguished chairmanship, Mr. Chope. I am grateful to everyone for leaving me a very reasonable amount of time in which to address all of these complex and important issues. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) on securing the debate. As we have heard, these are immensely important issues for our country and it is good to have the opportunity to discuss them. We have had a number of very interesting contributions from the hon. Members for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing), for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), and for Cambridge (David Howarth) and, briefly, from the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), who sadly had more pressing business than to stay for the conclusion of this debate.

We have had a very interesting debate, but I am afraid that I can agree with very few of the propositions that have been put forward. Instead, I want to make the case for the Union, for the United Kingdom, and for the measures that will support it. The starting point for everyone we have heard today is that the Union is a very precious institution for all the peoples of these islands and that we must do everything that we can to preserve and enhance it. I was very pleased to hear the stirring defence of it by the hon. Member for Epping Forest. I agree with every word that she said about that, but unfortunately with very little else that she said, but I will speak about that in a moment.

What lies at the heart of all the concerns that have been expressed today is a belief that, somehow, devolution has threatened the continued existence of the Union. That belief is mistaken. It is our view that devolution is not a threat to the United Kingdom; it secures the Union. The virtue of our Union's constitution is that, for centuries, it has been able to accommodate the differences within these islands. It does so on the basis of asymmetry. Constitutional arrangements to protect the interests of minorities inevitably differ from arrangements to protect the interests of the majority, and this nation, as hon. Members have said, has an asymmetrical balance of power in which England is overwhelmingly dominant in terms of both population and representation in Parliament.

Asymmetry is what gives rise to the West Lothian question, among other things, but it is not the same as imperfection. The hon. Lady sought to say that it was, but I am glad that she slid away from that proposition in her later remarks. At the beginning, she seemed to be hankering after some perfect symmetry. I think that that also lies behind the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey.

Asymmetry in our constitutional arrangements is nothing new. It has existed for hundreds of years. Legislative devolution in Scotland built on the distinctive Scottish institutions that remained after the Union of 1707, including the legal and educational systems. Extensive administrative devolution, built around the office of Secretary of State for Scotland from 1885, also provided the basis for the creation of the Scottish Executive and Parliament.

Mrs. Laing: I agree entirely with the Minister that that asymmetry is necessary in practical terms and perfectly acceptable. As a Scottish lawyer, I could not possibly disagree.

Mr. Wills: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for confirming that on that issue, at least, we are in the same place. It is important to recall that asymmetrical constitutional arrangements are nothing new. Wales has its own history within the Union. Until the early 20th century, Wales and England were administered as one, but in 1964, the first Secretary of State for Wales was appointed with their own Department, the Welsh Office. During the following 30 years or so, that role was progressively widened. The creation of the Welsh Assembly in 1999 put domestic Welsh policy issues under the democratic control of the Assembly.

Northern Ireland has been served for many years by a separate civil service, and separate Northern Ireland Departments have carried out the functions of their Whitehall counterparts. Such asymmetry is not confined to the United Kingdom. It is a feature of most modern democratic constitutions around the world, as the protections necessary for the more dominant partners in any state are not the same as those necessary for minorities.

We believe that the creation of a separate Scottish Parliament, Welsh Assembly and Northern Ireland Assembly has enabled better local decision making in response to local issues. It empowers local people and, to pick up the point made by the hon. Lady, local people perceive it to be fairer. We believe that that strengthens the Union, which is enormously important. We are bound together not just by a common identity and citizenship but by the enduring interests of all the nations of the Union.

All parts of the Union share resources and pool risks, to the benefit of each. That is a particularly important point to make to the House. At this time of extraordinarily rapid and extensive change in the world around us, pooling risk is important to all of us. We share access to natural resources and, more importantly, to the human resources made up of all the diverse peoples living here. The risks that we pool and carry together involve inherent uncertainty and are increasingly volatile. How do we thrive in an increasingly competitive globalised economy whose demands change ever more swiftly and radically? How do we manage the constantly evolving threat of international terrorism and major challenges such as climate change? In all those matters, we believe, as I hope everybody in this Chamber believes, that the United Kingdom is stronger together than apart. The hon. Lady made that point powerfully.

There have always been asymmetrical constitutional arrangements in the United Kingdom, both before and since devolution. They reflect the different sizes, historical backgrounds and aspirations of the different parts of the UK. That is true of England as well. Again, the hon. Lady made an important point: there is also immense diversity within the UK's constituent nations. The south-east is very different. The area represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey has distinctive characteristics and is quite different from other parts of the south-east, London and my own constituency of Swindon. Such diversity is a source of strength for all of us. We should celebrate it, and our constitutional arrangements must inevitably reflect it.

I come to the specific measures suggested in this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey is imaginative and creative in his policy making. He is a policy entrepreneur who brings great radicalism and insight to all his proposals, but I am afraid that on this occasion he is wrong. He argued for radical new constitutional structures, and some of his remarks found favour with other hon. Members who have spoken.

Before I address the points raised by my hon. Friend, I should like to correct something he said. He seemed to be suggesting that this Government were somehow conservative and predisposed towards the status quo. If he looks back on our record of constitutional reform and renewal in the past 11 years, he might wish to reconsider that attitude. We are perfectly willing to undertake constitutional reform when we think that it is merited, and we have done so consistently since 1997.

With respect to my hon. Friend, his proposals are impractical and might in many ways be dangerous to the future of the United Kingdom. As other hon. Members have recognised, if any federal structure were imposed in the United Kingdom, it would be dominated entirely by England. England has more than 85 per cent. of the population and creates more than 80 per cent. of the gross domestic product. Any separate English Parliament or equivalent would dominate the Union's macro-economic needs through decisions on spending policies, and the UK Parliament, however constituted, would be left trailing in its wake.

Any federation where one partner has 85 per cent. of the economic strength and the population simply cannot work. That is why constitutional experts generally reckon that only federations where no one partner has more than 30 per cent. of the population and the economic strength are viable. Nowhere in the world does such an unbalanced federation work.

Mr. Andrew Turner: I hear the Minister say that, but he has not explained why. Can he do so?

Mr. Wills: I shall come to the explanation, because I want particularly to address the hon. Gentleman's comments about an English Parliament and what I took to be his advocacy of, or certainly his constructive engagement with, that idea. I shall address that quite specifically.

To sum up my remarks on the proposals made by my hon. Friend, he made a radical proposal for reform of the House of Lords. We are bringing forward our own proposals for House of Lords reform, and I am sure that he will be interested to see them shortly.

Derek Wyatt: Does my hon. Friend think that it is appropriate that the English have one regional Committee, which has not met since June 2004? Is he saying that he is proud of that record? I think that it has met only five times in 11 and a half years. Is that how we should treat the English in the House?

Mr. Wills: I shall address the question of Select Committees now, because I want to address the idea of an English Grand Committee and say what we are doing to introduce proposals to reflect my hon. Friend's concerns. I accept that we need to do more to consider how better to represent the regions of this country. Since last year, we have been introducing proposals, which I shall address shortly. My hon. Friend asked me what I am proud of. I am proud of this Government's record on constitutional reform and renewal. It is genuinely radical, and it is doing a great deal for the people of this country.

There has been a lot of discussion about an English Grand Committee. The hon. Member for Epping Forest said that it should be actively considered. We are actively considering it. We have actively considered it, and it is difficult to see what benefits such a Committee would bring. An English Grand Committee that directly mirrored the other two would have 529 members. It would be impossible for such a Committee to work in the same way as other Grand Committees.

We have, however, proposed the establishment of regional Select Committees to ensure that English regions' different views are taken properly into account, which would support the network of regional Ministers that we have introduced, which is already working well. We believe that to be a much more effective way in which to ensure that the varied needs of the English people are given focused consideration, particularly in relation to matters that cross the boundaries of even the largest local authorities. Although I cannot agree with my hon. Friend's proposals in their entirety, I hope that he would agree that our proposals at least address the sorts of concerns that he outlined, and believes me when I say that we will bring this forward.

Mrs. Laing rose—

Mr. Andrew Turner rose—

Mr. Wills: I shall give way to both hon. Members in a moment.

If we take further the proposal for an English Grand Committee to consider English legislation, we will be led down a slippery slope towards an English Parliament, which is an issue that I want to address, and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight has raised some concerns that I will also address shortly. For the reasons that I have given, however, I believe that such a policy would ultimately lead to the break-up of the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Laing: The Minister has anticipated my question, and answered it with the reference to a slippery slope towards the break-up of the United Kingdom, which of course was said about the Scottish Parliament. However, it is precisely to stop us further descending down that slippery slope that some of us have proposed English votes for English laws.

Mr. Wills: I give way to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The problem is with the maps that have been drawn, and which keep popping up. The Isle of Wight is more like Devon than Berkshire, and Berkshire, or at least Reading, is more like Swindon than Oxford. Such points are not understood by those who follow the maps.

Mr. Wills: I completely understand the problems with drawing boundaries, but of course such issues will always exist.

David Howarth: Before the Minister moves on, how is it envisaged that the regional Select Committees will work?

Derek Wyatt: And when?

David Howarth: Are the Government still insisting that the Labour party must have a majority on each Committee? That would lead to impossible difficulties in regions where it does not have sufficient members, and would seem to undermine the idea that the regional Select Committees should be representative of their regions.

Mr. Wills: We will bring forward details shortly, so the hon. Gentleman will just have to be patient for a few more weeks—that also answers my hon. Friend's sedentary question.

This debate highlights the very difficult problem, for all of us who must confront such issues, of the composition of such Committees. However, I shall come to the nub of the question about an English Parliament, or Grand Chamber, which in effect would be a precursor to an English Parliament. Such questions are raised very frequently. At the heart of the promotion of such measures lie two myths, which the hon. Members for Isle of Wight and for Epping Forest have perpetuated again today. The first is that it is in the Labour party's narrow self-interest to resist them, because we do not have a sufficient majority of MPs in England, but historically that simply has not been the case.

I shall take up a little of the Chamber's time to give a few figures for recent elections. In the following elections, the Labour party had a comfortable majority of English MPs: 1945, 1966, 1977, 2001 and 2005. So the hon. Lady's comments simply are not rooted in fact. In two elections—1964 and 1974—the Conservatives had a majority of English MPs under a Labour Government. In October 1974, and in 1950, there was no overall control. Astute Members will have spotted that when a Labour Government have had a comfortable working majority, over the UK Parliament as a whole, they have also had a comfortable majority of English MPs, as logic would suggest—irrespective of what she implied. Under a very narrow majority—as there was in 1950, 1964 and 1974—there have been problems, but of course any Government with as narrow a majority as that which the Labour Government had following those elections will have all kinds of other problems in managing their majority. It simply is not true, therefore, that our opposition to the sorts of proposals put forward today is in the Labour party's narrow self-interest. We are concerned solely with the preservation of the Union.

Mrs. Laing: I do not for one second dispute the Minister's figures, or indeed his statistical analysis, but surely he and his fellow Ministers, when planning Government policy, look not to past statistics, but to the statistics of the present and the possible statistics of the future. At the moment, it is not likely that a Labour Government, if elected in the next few years, would have a large and comfortable majority.

Mr. Wills: On the basis of historical evidence and projections, if a Labour Government are re-elected with a comfortable working majority in the House, they will most likely have a comfortable working majority of English MPs. The hon. Lady can form her own views about whether that will happen, but that is a completely separate issue. If the Conservative party's representation in Scotland remains the same—it has a very small proportion of the Scottish MPs—under her arrangements, it would have considerable difficulty passing Bills relating only Scotland in the UK Parliament. I ask her to consider that.

[Mr. Wills]

Mrs. Laing Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Wills: I hope that the hon. Lady will forgive me for not giving way, but I want to come on to the second myth. I was—very generously—left a lot of time at the beginning of my remarks, but I have many more important points to make about, for example, the Barnett formula, among other things, which I am sure that hon. Members would like to hear.

A second myth has been floated: that it is possible to define an English Bill. It is in fact extremely hard, and anyone who has observed the legislative process in this House will realise just how difficult it would be to define one. The Higher Education Bill was adduced as an example of how the current system is unfair. At the time, in 2004, that Bill was dubbed a West Lothian Bill by the Conservative party, because student finance is devolved. I think that point was made earlier. However, part 1 of the Bill provided for the Arts and Humanities Research Council, which extended to the whole of the UK. In other words, this Bill, which so often is adduced as an example of an English Bill, was nothing of the sort.

Much more important, however, is the difficulty of isolating any Bill from having an effect throughout the United Kingdom, partly owing to the way in which the Scottish block grant is determined. However, there are other reasons, and I can do no better than to quote the Kilbrandon royal commission on the constitution, because it put the point extremely well. It said that "any issue at Westminster involving expenditure of public money is...of concern to all parts of the United Kingdom since it may directly affect the level of taxation and indirectly influence the level of a region's own expenditure".

That is not a party political point; it is the extremely astute and elegantly expressed comment of a royal commission, and we should all bear it in mind when we discuss these issues.

I come to the Barnett formula and funding, which I think all hon. Members have mentioned today, and which is always a lively issue. We have heard a lot about the inequities of the system, and I should like to correct some common misconceptions about the way in which it operates. Some high-profile devolved administration decisions and much of the associated media coverage have created the impression that there are—to use the hon. Member for Epping Forest's phrase—unfair differences between public services in different parts of the UK, and that the devolved administrations receive funding for services additional to those available in England. That is not the case. They receive a block grant to spend on the public services for which they are responsible. The mathematical formula that underpins the Barnett formula has not changed since its inception, including through 18 years of Conservative Governments.

Devolved administrations have pursued some policies that are not replicated in England, but that is what they are there for. By increasing spending in certain areas, such as by giving free prescriptions and personal care, they inevitably have to make reductions in other key public services. That is the part that we do not hear about in all the public discussion on the spending policies of the devolved administrations. This year, universities in Scotland, which are an important part of the infrastructure, will have a real-term reduction in funding, whereas the total grant to the Higher Education Funding Council for England, which distributes public money to universities and colleges for teaching and research, will rise 2.5 per cent. a year between 2008 and 2011. Similarly, health spending in England will rise in real terms by 4 per cent. a year for the next three years, whereas in Scotland it will rise by only 1.5 per cent. We do not often hear about that sort of discrepancy, but it matters.

It is inevitable that devolved administrations will have different priorities and will make different choices, but that is not necessarily unfair—it is just different. The two are not synonymous. Another important issue is respite care for the parents and carers of disabled children. In England, it is funded by the Government through a £340 million programme, but in Scotland it is not guaranteed. That is another discrepancy, but it is not necessarily unfair to the people of England.

I was pleased to hear an hon. Member—not my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey, but the hon. Member for Cambridge, I think—mention the importance of need when considering funding. The Barnett formula depends on assessment of need. My hon. Friend did some careful and nice per capita calculations, but with spending figures, the crucial consideration must always be need. That is what determines fairness—to pick up on the hon. Lady's phrase again. Fairness is absolutely essential; the Government believe that above all else. If one considers fairness in spending, one has to consider need. There will be differences in how precisely one defines it, but it is fundamentally important and one must bear it in mind when one considers the figures. I hope that my hon. Friend will remember that.

Mr. Andrew Turner: What about London? The greatest amount of money seems to be spent there, but that could not be for reasons only of need.

Mr. Wills: I am not a London MP, and I hesitate to trespass on these extremely delicate issues. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, if any London MPs were present, they would strongly contest what he says. It is inevitable, with definitions of need, that individual areas will tend to put their priorities highest. Local authorities are always complaining about how unfairly they are treated, whichever part of the country they are in, because their definition of their needs and the priorities given to them are always different. That is true across local authorities and regions, and between Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and England. It is inevitable that there will be such differences and arguments. There probably will never be a settled conclusion on precise definitions of need. That is democratic debate and we could discuss it for ever. Need should always be borne in mind, and I am very glad that it was brought into the debate. I hope that my hon. Friend will remember that when he discusses these figures in future.

We have had an interesting debate, which has shown that devolution will continue to be a matter for discussion, but we believe that it has secured the future of the Union. It is easy to forget what the situation was like in the 1990s when feelings were running extremely high in Scotland. I remind the hon. Member for Epping Forest that the people of Scotland felt that it was being used unfairly as a laboratory for the divisive social and economic policies of the Conservative Government of the time. The people of Scotland still have not forgotten that they were used to test the implementation of the poll tax. Such issues raised tensions to an extremely high level.

Whatever one thinks of the current Administration in Scotland, most people would accept that we have a vibrant devolution settlement. The recent mayoral elections in London, although they did not turn out as I wished, were nevertheless a good advertisement for our vibrant devolved democracy, and will continue to be so. Our measures on devolution have enhanced the constitutional arrangements of this country and have preserved the Union. They deliver essential flexibility and allow the devolved administrations and legislatures the ability to deliver distinctive policies, and it is right and proper that they should do so. The fact that there is also a single Government taking a UK-wide view has enabled us to have the stable macro-economic policy that has delivered growth year on year for the past 10 years and has kept us in good shape to face the turbulent global economic challenges that lie ahead.

Our constitutional arrangements have delivered a common social security system that assists those who are most in need across the UK, building the common sense of identity that is so important. We have been able to adopt a common approach, which, I hope hon. Members agree, is important for dealing with the challenges of terrorism and formulating common policies on defence and foreign affairs. It is our profound belief that the Union benefits all the people of the United Kingdom. It reflects our shared history and heritage, and supports the successful participation of all the peoples of these islands in a global economy. It promotes our international standing, and I hope that none of us will do anything to damage it. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey; agrees with me on that, but I am afraid that his proposals would risk—inadvertently, I am sure—damaging the Union that is so precious to us all. I hope that he will reconsider his proposal, but I welcome his continued contribution to this debate.

Academies

10.59 am

Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to have secured this debate, which allows me to put on record my concerns about the whole academy programme, both nationally and in my constituency.

I do not think that anybody will deny the investment that this Government have made in education since 1997, but the debate is about the academies programme. Despite considerable evidence that that system of educational reform simply does not work, the Government recently indicated that the scheme was to be expanded. Whatever Ministers and private sector investors might tell us, the academies programme is the privatisation of our education system in all but name. Why would private investors and multinational companies, one of which phoned me this week to try to influence the debate, be so keen to get their hands on our schools if not for the purpose of profit? The academies scheme is a flawed and futile way to reform education and will further only the marketisation of public services, not investment and achievement in education.

I do not doubt Ministers' sincerity when they say that they want to improve standards in schools. No one wants a school to decline. However, our main argument should be about how best we can achieve our aims of improvement, attainment and fulfilment, rather than do the opposite. The pro-academy lobby talks about standards purely to justify a move towards a system to which most people are essentially opposed. For example, it looks at a failing or underperforming school and asks people whether they want it to improve. Of course, everyone in the local community rightly says yes. A take-it-or-leave-it offer of an academy school instead of the existing failing school is then put on the table. As one would expect, the investment is welcomed by all, but I am yet to hear a convincing argument that similar investment in a new comprehensive or a smaller through-school would fail to achieve the same aim.

It seems that Ministers are convinced by the argument that academies work where comprehensives do not, yet the pure facts do not back that up. In my constituency, the Ridings school, a former comprehensive that many hon. Members will have heard of, is merging with Holy Trinity Church of England school to form a new, supposedly state-of-the-art academy venture. It is expected that attainment standards will increase because of the merger, which is the argument that the pro-academy lobby has used to perpetrate the case for academies. However, it is not likely that children who are underachieving in their present schools will receive the care and attention that they require to improve in an academy of 1,000-plus children. Furthermore, it has not been proved that removing accountability from local education authorities is of any potential benefit to a community that is already struggling to keep up with neighbouring areas.

Although it is premature, the decision to have an academy in Halifax has been taken. However, I am appalled that not enough consideration has been given to whether that fleeting venture will really work and benefit people in that part of my constituency. It seems a short-term fix for a long-term problem.

[Mrs. Linda Riordan]

I have heard similar stories about academies from across the country. They are seen as an easy answer to the difficult task of providing adequate education in deprived areas with schools that have with low attainment levels and poor Ofsted reports. The idea is attractive to most, with its promises of increased investment, new buildings and a new beginning for underachieving areas—at least until we scratch beneath the surface. Consultations are rushed and local opinions are generally not surveyed. For example, consultation with parents in Halifax was held during the school holidays, even though the decision had actually been taken well before. So much for being in touch with the feelings of local communities.

Alas, it seems that a new academy will shortly open in my constituency. What worries me most is that it does not seem that enough attention has been given to how it will fit into the current education structure. Perhaps the Minister will tell me differently. With two grammar schools, faith schools and local comprehensives, Halifax does not have the most uniform of school systems. Parents who cannot get their children into the local grammar or Church schools are forced to play the system and send them to comprehensives away from their catchment area—for instance, in the neighbouring Calder valley. What is left in Halifax is a last resort for most parents: a modern secondary, the Ridings school. I admit that it has had disappointing exam results in recent years, but it is likely to have an even more unstable future as a new academy after the merger.

Of course something needed to be done about falling standards, but why an academy and why now? In my opinion, the whole ideology behind the academies system has an economic, not an educational purpose. The merger of a well performing faith school in Halifax with an underachieving comprehensive school in an effort to make one super-school has aggravated many people in the community. Will the Minister tell me what the point of the consultation was, given that my constituents' views were not even taken into account? Are people's views taken on board, and if so, why have they not been reflected in Halifax?

I believe that academies are wrong for four fundamental reasons. I hope that hon. Members will agree with me when they have heard the debate. Those four points have led me to believe that, rather than roll out the academies programme further, the Government should consider scrapping the whole thing in favour of a system that local communities actually want. In my case, that is smaller through-schools covering the ages of four to 16 or 18.

First, academies are anti-democratic. The sponsors nominate the majority of school governors and academies are not under the control or direction of the local authority. In effect, there is no accountability. Secondly, the sponsorship system is flawed. Sponsors are not required to declare who gives them money, so they are entirely unaccountable and out of the control of local councils. Newcastle city council recently wrote to the Department for Children, Schools and Families requesting that an academy sponsor with somewhat dubious habits be removed. Why does that need to be a central Government, rather than local government, decision?

Thirdly, academies practise covert selection. For example, the intake of children with special needs, who may carry poor academic records, can be restricted. Surely we are not encouraging a system of exclusion in this day and age. Furthermore, as academies receive considerably more capital funding than community or foundation schools, they have the potential to undermine local admissions policies.

Finally, academies have not been proven to rectify poor attainment levels as one would have hoped. On 11 June, a full list of failing schools was published. Barnsley academy rated sixth from lowest in the country, with only 20 per cent. of its students achieving five A* to C GCSE results.

Despite that, the Government seem determined to drive on, unaware of the dangers that lie ahead. The move away from the comprehensive ideal is contrary to the values and visions at the heart of the Labour movement, and I profoundly regret it. I am not saying that change was not needed in Halifax, but I have not discounted the possibility of better ways to improve education than this back-door privatisation scheme.

With your permission, Mr. Chope, I shall hand over to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), who is the chairman of the anti-academies alliance.

11.8 am

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Riordan) for allowing me to make a few points about academies in her constituency and elsewhere. I congratulate her on securing this timely debate.

I preface my comments by saying that the Minister has made it plain on a number of occasions that his aim is to secure the best educational opportunities for young people aged 14 to 19. He makes no pretence that any particular plan must include an academy or must not include an academy. He is looking for the best and, in regard to that matter, we all applaud his integrity and his intention. Nevertheless, it must be said that, notwithstanding his value-free assessment of the place of academies in a wider solution to some of the problems that beset our secondary schools, other forces are not quite so benign.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax has referred to the raft of business people who have been called in as though they had some magic formula to turn round schools, when in fact the evidence shows that they have had no such success that can be backed up at in any real, meaningful and statistically sound manner. I will mention a few of these business people. There is Lord Harris of Peckham, the Carpetright plc chairman; I think that he is pretty good at selling carpets. There is Lord Laidlaw, who is a bit more problematic; he was disgraced for his antics in Monaco and exposed by the News of the World. There is David Samworth of Pukka Pies—a background that I think provides really good groundwork in education policy—and David Crossland, founder of Airtours. The organisations involved include Carphone Warehouse, the Society of Merchant Venturers, and Tarmac. Tarmac is a very good company in my constituency, but as for education? Well, Tarmac is pretty good at roads, but I am not too sure about secondary schools.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The hon. Gentleman makes his point extremely well. However, is this not a case of new money going into education to raise the educational attainment of children who, for whatever reason, are not achieving well at the moment?

Mr. Purchase: The new money is almost entirely coming from the Government, because none of these sponsors can say, hand on heart, that they have put their hand in their back pocket and produced £2 million. No one can find evidence of that, simply because they have not done it. What they have done, in many cases, is to sell services to the school that they now own and then pretended that they sold those services at a discount rate, and somehow that counts against their £2 million contribution. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has been taken in.

The real boost to education spending has come from Government sources. I must say that the Minister for Schools and Learners, who is here today, has made some real progress, for example, in tightening up the admissions criteria. However, there is little doubt that the academies have found ways and means by which they can overcome the proper restrictions that the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families has put upon them.

Academies have found ways of expelling more than the average number of students who are expelled from schools. In Walsall, which is next door to my constituency, the new academy replaced a school that had 50 per cent. of its children receiving free school meals. The figure for children receiving free school meals is understood to be a very good single indicator of deprivation within a school population. Guess what, though? The academy in Walsall now has just 11 per cent. of children receiving free school meals. So I share all the fears that my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax has expressed about her own constituency and the deprivation there, which I know she deals with daily.

Regarding the sponsors that we have for academies, I mentioned at Prime Minister's Question Time some time ago a conversation that was alleged to have taken place between Lord Harris of Peckham and Lord Adonis, who is a former member of the Social Democratic party, I think. In this conversation that is alleged to have taken place between them, Lord Harris is reported to have said, "Well, he"—that is, Lord Adonis—"will ring me up and say, 'Look, I've got this school, it ain't doing this and doing that.' Then, I say to him, 'What's it like with so-and-so?' And if I like it, I say, 'OK, I'll have it.'" Now, in my opinion, that is not the way in which an Education Minister should be conducting affairs that affect the future of thousands of young people, if not many more.

Even more than that, what do we get? Francis Beckett, the journalist, interviewed Lord Harris on these matters and he said that he got his first taste of the entrepreneurial edge that such men can bring to our schools. He said:

> "I was sat in the back of Lord Harris's limousine. First, he phoned round all his stores and asked for their sales figures, then he phoned round all his schools".

He did so to find out who was in school that morning. That is the kind of nonsense that we are now into.

Education is supposed to be done by educationists. There is absolutely no evidence at all, not even in the Government's PricewaterhouseCoopers report, that can substantiate in any real sense the claim that academies have brought to the party what they were supposed to bring. They were intended initially to replace really difficult, so-called failing schools in our inner cities. When that plan did not work, Lord Adonis announced that he wanted to expand his programme. Would anyone believe that we now have private schools looking to the Government to help them to become academies and to give them the kind of support that they have craved from the very beginning?

So now we have a position where, in an interview in The Spectator—Mr. Chope, you will be aware that The Spectator is the Tory house magazine—Lord Harris stated his view that the only achievement of comprehensive education in this country had been to "destroy" good grammar schools. Lord Adonis is the person that our former Prime Minister, Mr. Tony Blair, who has now retired from that office, put in charge of the Labour party's education policy. I find it absolutely extraordinary that a man who was so opposed to everything—everything—that the comprehensive ideal had tried to achieve should be put in charge of that policy.

I finish by reminding hon. Members of the history. When Butler produced his famous Education Act in 1944, it opened up the possibilities, for the first time, of education for all. In the 1960s, an heroic Labour Government produced the circular that allowed comprehensive education to become the norm. Lady Thatcher actually closed more grammar schools than any other Minister before or since. We have had a genuine advancement of opportunity.

However, what we are seeing now is a process of closing down opportunities again, so that we have faith schools, specialist schools and trust schools—you name it, you can have any school you like, except you cannot get into them. The problem that we now have is not one of diversity; what we have now is the break-up of a truly magnificent ideal of comprehensive education. I say now that, if this academy movement is allowed to succeed, the long, long road that we have all been fighting on to get comprehensive schools available to all will be further diminished and this country will be the poorer for it.

11.18 am

The Minister for Schools and Learners (Jim Knight): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Riordan) on securing this debate. Along with my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), she has raised some important points and it is helpful for me to have the opportunity to clarify the Government's position.

I will start by providing some context. As, I think, my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax said, it is our ambition that every child benefits from a good education; from a good-quality place in a local school, where high standards set them on the path to achieving all that they are capable of. That is what every parent wants from their local school.

In the children's plan we have made a commitment that, by 2020, at least 90 per cent. of young people will achieve five higher-level GCSEs or more by the time that they reach the age of 19. In order to do that, we have created a floor target under every school, which states that, as an important step towards that 90 per cent. figure, at least 30 per cent. of pupils in every secondary school in the country should achieve five higher-level GCSEs including English and maths, which are the priority subjects, by 2011.

[Jim Knight]

Over the last 10 years, we have made major inroads, which is largely down to the efforts of teachers, pupils and school leaders. In 1997, more than 1,600 secondary schools—more than half of secondary schools—were falling short of that 30 per cent. figure. Today, that figure is down to 638, which is about 22 per cent. of secondary schools. However, even one school that falls below that basic floor target is unacceptable. We are aiming for, and will achieve, a target of zero schools failing to reach the target figure by 2011. That is why the Prime Minister is committed to ensuring that every school is above the floor target by 2011. Those that are not will be subject to a formal intervention.

That is why last week we announced the national challenge, which is the next stage of our improvement strategy to help those remaining schools and their local authorities to address the issues, to meet the floor target and, crucially, to provide their students with the good education that is so essential to success in later life. As part of the national challenge, they are being offered a range of support and intervention.

Many schools are progressing well. They are successful but need just a little more support, not radical intervention. Others need considerably more support in respect of leadership, governance, teaching and pupils, and still others need more radical solutions. Even then, different circumstances require different solutions, depending on the particular challenges a school or area faces. That is why we are asking local authorities to prepare plans for their schools. They may involve a merger with another school, closure, or replacement with a national challenge trust school or, of course, an academy—the subject of this debate.

The national challenge programme is backed by an additional £200 million reprioritised from existing resources, on top of £200 million already made available in the Budget. That is £400 million of extra funding to support those schools over the next three years. The funding will support the range of interventions and preventions that schools and local authorities need. We will have local authorities' plans by the end of the summer term, and they will include academies. My Department will work with the 26 academies currently below the floor target on exactly the same basis as we would with other schools.

Academies have a proven track record as a successful solution. They allow staff and pupils to make a clean break from the past and, often, from a legacy of generations of underperformance. They offer new leadership, stronger governance and curriculum freedoms. They have all the ingredients to be able to offer much more flexibility to deal with the problems and circumstances that resulted in their predecessor schools letting down generations of young people by providing an inadequate education. From that flexibility comes real innovation and a stronger ethos. Academies are supremely popular with parents.

As a group, academies continue to have the fastest improving academic performance in the country. Their overall absence rate is down by twice the national rate of improvement. Academies with underperforming predecessor schools saw the proportion of their pupils gaining five or more higher-level GCSEs double between 2001 and 2007. If we include English and maths, the improvement was still considerable—more than 11 percentage points, which is significantly higher than the national average.

Academies are in some of the most challenging areas, and they succeed some of the most challenging schools in the country, often with high proportions of children with special educational needs. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East raised some questions about that. The average number of pupils with special educational needs in academies is 29.5 per cent., compared with the national average of 19.2 per cent., so academies are doing more than their fair share in respect of SEN. The national average for the number of children with free school meal entitlements in secondary schools is 13.1 per cent. In academies, it is 33.8 per cent., so they are doing more than their fair share in terms of educating the more disadvantaged pupils in our country.

They are finally giving our most disadvantaged communities good education and a route to self-improvement. My hon. Friends do not have to take just my word for it—the fourth PricewaterhouseCoopers report, which was published last year, stated:

"The general picture in relation to pupil performance in Academies is one of overall improvement against a range of indicators at Key Stage 3, Key Stage 4 and post-16 levels."

PricewaterhouseCoopers is currently undertaking its fifth and final review, which is due to be completed in the autumn.

Mr. Purchase: The PricewaterhouseCoopers report shows clearly that exam results for academies are not significantly different from other schools with much less funding. More than that, great evidence is already available that academies and city technology colleges are putting people into exams that are easier to pass and are therefore boosting their apparent results. The Minister's own report shows that.

Jim Knight: If my hon. Friend does not like PricewaterhouseCoopers, why does he not look at the National Audit Office, which last year found that academies are "on track to deliver good value for money", are

"popular with parents and staff", and are improving educational attainment at a much faster rate than the national average?

Mr. Purchase: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Jim Knight: I must make some progress, because there is a limited amount of time. I know that my hon. Friend will be friendly in that regard.

Of the academies that have so far been inspected by Ofsted, 96 per cent. were judged to have good or outstanding leadership, compared with 62 per cent. of secondary schools in general.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax has raised concerns in the past that the academies programme represents the privatisation of state education. She repeated that today. Let me firmly reassure her on that point, which is simply not true. Academies are state-funded schools. They are funded directly by my Department—by the Secretary of State—and they provide free education, often to our most deprived communities and without selection by ability. Whether from the private, voluntary or education sector, academy sponsors bring to their schools a track record of achieving when faced with difficult challenges. They bring dynamism, a commitment to excellence and the backing that the principal and the staff need to succeed in a tough educational environment. Academy sponsors do not and cannot make a profit from their involvement in academies.

The most recent changes have been to allow universities and others with a strong educational track record to waive the £2 million entry fee for sponsorship. Also, in July 2006, we set up an endowment model, so that the £2 million could be paid over five years, with £500,000 in the first year as part of the endowment. The sponsors of the new academy in north Halifax will be a local university, a local college and a local council, and they will be led by the diocese of Wakefield—that is hardly privatisation.

Mr. Purchase: The Minister refers to various reports. A seminal report that he has not mentioned but should have, as it is the only independent one, was done by the Public Accounts Committee, which found that the academy programme should be halted until a better way is found to get value for money. Never mind PricewaterhouseCoopers, which does too much work for the Government.

Jim Knight: The NAO and the Public Accounts Committee work together. I do not think that there is anything biased about the NAO, which gave the academies programme a clean bill of health.

All the sponsors of the academy in north Halifax have considerable expertise in education in the local area and a vested interest in making the school a success.

Academies may not be popular with my hon. Friends the Members for Halifax and for Wolverhampton, North-East, but they clearly benefit staff, parents and pupils and can reverse the fortunes of struggling schools in a short space of time. I am confident that, in time, my noble Friend Lord Adonis will be viewed as a hero of the Labour movement, thanks to the transformation of education in London under his stewardship. London schools now outperform the national average, and in large part academies have been an essential ingredient of that success.

That remedy is something that my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax can look forward to in her constituency. Currently, there are not enough good-quality school places for all the children who need them. As she said, about one third of children are obliged to travel to schools outside their local area. The Holy Trinity Church of England senior school is oversubscribed, with a significant loss of pupils at 16. The Ridings school has twice been in special measures and has been unable to shake the bad reputation it gained in 1996. That is why the decision was taken last year by Calderdale council to close the school in August 2009.

The broader scene in Halifax is much brighter. Holy Trinity school is doing well, with an unauthorised absence rate well below the national average, and 56 per cent. of its pupils achieve at least five higher-level GCSEs including English and maths. Sadly, only a narrow proportion of local children are able to benefit from its provision, due to the admissions arrangements of the school. The situation will be transformed by an academy with enlarged numbers, which will impact positively across the community. Admissions will be based on proximity, with more choice being opened up to more pupils to be educated locally. An academy will bring a stronger community focus to the local area, drawing together a more diverse population and therefore creating provision that better reflects the area that it serves. Crucially, it will drive out some of the failure that the system has seen in recent years and will raise standards for the pupils of Halifax.

Academies are not an easy solution. There never is one. For some schools, a bit of extra support will be enough. For others, more profound changes are needed. The programme is about improving schools in a way that best serves the needs of their communities. We believe, along with the local authority and the diocese, that an academy in north Halifax is the right solution. Academies are a proven route to success, to raising standards and to fairer access to a good education for all. The children of Halifax deserve nothing less.

11.29 am

Sitting suspended.

Gypsy Encampments (Wiltshire)

2.30 pm

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): May I say how pleased I am to have this opportunity to raise a matter that is of huge importance in my constituency of North Wiltshire and across the county of Wiltshire? Other hon. Members from elsewhere in England will be watching the progress of this debate, because many of my arguments would apply in most other counties across the nation of England. So this is a debate with a broader aspect, despite its title. In that context, I am glad to be joined by two colleagues from Wiltshire: my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who has flown in on the red eye from Washington especially to be here, for which we are grateful, and my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison). My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) sends his apologies: he has an urgent engagement in Salisbury and has been detained there. He would have been here otherwise and I understand that he supports what we will be saying during the debate.

This is a grave and great matter, particularly in my constituency. In the past month or so North Wiltshire district council has been consulting on whether and where it should allow a new Gypsy encampment, currently for 24 pitches but, potentially, for 48: there may be two sites of 24. The excellent firm, Humberts, which carried out a survey into the matter came up with a list of six possible sites for this encampment in my constituency.

It will be no surprise to hon. Members to hear that the people who live next door to each of those encampments have been expressing their opinion on the subject forcfully. There was a meeting in the town of Calne, in my right hon. and learned Friend's constituency last night, attended by 750 people. That is a bigger public meeting than I have seen in my 11 or 12 years as a Member of Parliament. Similarly, a public meeting in Wootton Bassett last week was so large that it had to be divided into three separate groupings. There was a huge demonstration through the town of Chippenham a couple of weeks back, even though we folk in Chippenham do not have many public demonstrations. Public meetings have been held elsewhere. It is a matter of great and grave concern.

I thought that it would be useful to have this debate and to attempt to focus public attention particularly on where it ought to be and away from where it ought not to be. I entirely deprecate and distance myself from those people who argue on this matter by saying that, in their view, Gypsies and Travellers—I will return to the precise use of the words in a moment—are people whom we would not necessarily want to live near. I have to say that that is not my experience in Wiltshire. I know a good number of Gypsies and many of them, particularly the traditional Wiltshire Romany Gypsies are perfectly charming. The police tell me that there is no evidence whatsoever that they are less law-abiding than the rest of us or that they leave more fly-tipping waste. I had a briefing this morning from the Country Land and Business Association, which said that there is no evidence that they are more guilty of fly-tipping than anyone else. I know of no evidence that they are necessarily less good neighbours than the rest of us.

I deprecate and distance myself from those who have used extreme and difficult language during the debates that we have had in Wiltshire, indicating that as a group or a race these are people whom we do not want near us, because that is not so. It would be wrong if we had this debate along those lines. This debate must be about planning, which some people might think is a boring, dreary matter in some contexts. Nevertheless, it is about planning and the way that we handle the need for sites for these people, in the same way as we deal with building houses for those of us of a settled nature.

Just a word on the way that we describe Gypsies. I use the word "Gypsies" as a shorthand term. My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) picked me up on this matter earlier and suggested that we must be careful about our use of language. She is right. The difficulty with the Government's policy in this area is that they do not differentiate, racially, as it were, between Romany Gypsies and other groups. We have a good Romany population in Wiltshire and they are a particular racial group that tends to use the name Smith—Maggie Smith-Bendall is one of their great spokesmen—and has particular genes and chromosomes; they are a discernible racial group. Then there are the Roma, many of whom are coming into this country from Romania, as the name indicates, the Irish Travellers—we have quite a large number of them—and the assorted new age travellers, hippies and general drop-outs of one sort or another. The trouble with the Government's consultation on this subject is that they neither differentiate between those groups of people nor where they come from. Some of them have nothing whatever to do with the county of Wiltshire: many of them come from elsewhere.

At the moment, the southern Irish Government are busy tightening up their rules and regulations about Gypsy encampments and I understand that a substantial number of people in southern Ireland are currently eyeing up England and considering whether to move here. Of course, the standard of life in Romania is extremely poor and large numbers of people there are, equally, considering whether it might be useful to move their caravans to England and, presumably, to Wiltshire, among other places. It is important that we differentiate between the different groups and I will do so. For the sake of shorthand, I will use the term "Gypsy" to encompass all of them. However, it is important that we are clear in our discussions about precisely whom we are talking about and that we do not lump them all together.

An unfortunate episode occurred in a recent planning discussion with regard to the Gypsies who are illegally camped at the village of Minety in my constituency and who have been there for some five years. I will return to that in a moment. During the inspector's consideration of the matter in Monkton Park in Chippenham, the Wiltshire Romanies said that they did not want to live at Thingley junction, a Gypsy encampment near Chippenham with plenty of vacancies available for them, because the people at Thingley were Irish and they were Wiltshire Romanies and they did not like the Irish and did not want to live with them. Equally, the family of Smiths who left Thingley junction some years ago, where they were illegally camped—they are now camped legally in Pudding Brook in Chippenham—also fell out with the Irish at Thingley.

That is all very well, but if somebody comes into my constituency surgery next week and says, "I am a Scotsman. I want a council house, but I am not going to stay in the one I'm in at the moment, because the person next door is Welsh and the person on the other side is French and I don't want to live near them," I will say, "I am extremely sorry. My duty is to help you find proper accommodation, but if you don't like living next door to Welsh people, that's your problem, not mine." I do not accept that the racism within the Gypsy and Traveller community is any more acceptable than racism outside it. I shall return to that matter.

Before I move on to general policy with regard to Traveller provision in Wiltshire, I shall mention a peculiarity in respect of the site at Minety near Malmesbury in my constituency. Travelling people bought the land that the site is on some five years ago and moved on to it in large numbers over a bank holiday weekend, which is the normal way such things are done. They came on to the site and nobody knew anything about it, concreted it over and built toilet blocks. It was a substantial operation. From memory, there are now 30 or 40 caravans on that site. It is entirely illegal: they have no planning permission—it is the middle of the countryside—and they should not be there. The district council concluded that the site breached planning law and that the people should be removed from it. As always happens on such occasions, they have gone through the entire process of the law and explored every corner of the planning law. The final consideration of their illegal encampment is due to be heard in Chippenham from 8 July.

The conundrum is that the inspector has already said that, unless North Wiltshire district council is able to demonstrate that it has provided a site elsewhere for the people at Minety, he will be inclined to allow them to remain in their illegal encampment. Hon. Members might say, "Fair enough. If they can't go somewhere else, fine. Let them stay where they are." But just think of the precedent that that is setting: it would be saying to Gypsies anywhere, "You may plonk yourself down in any field anywhere and if the district council cannot come up with a decent permanent site for you, we will allow you to stay there forever." In other words, we are saying to the Gypsy population throughout the world, "Please do break planning law, because that'll force the district council to do what you want it to do to provide more sites."

Let us imagine that a group of homeless or inadequately housed people come to me and say, "I know what we're going to do Mr. Gray. We're going to build a village in the countryside. We're going to put up rickety tents, old houses, tin shacks—you name it. We're going to live there until the district council builds more houses. We want a house; we can't get a house, so we're going to build an illegal encampment in a field." Those people would be thrown out in the twinkling of an eye. The ordinary settled population would not be allowed to do such things. It is only because these people call themselves Gypsies—in the case of the Minety lot they are Gypsies or proper old-fashioned Romanies—that they are allowed to breach planning law in such a way.

I submit that that is quite wrong. The law—planning or any other law—should apply to Gypsies and Travellers in precisely the same way as it does to the settled population. My duty is to help the settled population find accommodation and I am happy to do so. I happily do the same thing for the Gypsy population, but I do not see why they should be given rights that other people do not have. Everyone should be treated in precisely the same way.

Leaving Minety aside, I shall talk about the current situation regarding provision in the county of Wiltshire. In comparison with most other counties in England, we are reasonably well supplied with sites for Travellers in Wiltshire. Wiltshire county council manages six residential sites and there are 96 pitches all together. Each pitch has two caravans so there are 192 pitches and 200 residents. There are also transit sites consisting of 12 pitches. Wiltshire is therefore one of the best county's for Traveller site provision in England.

So, people might well ask why more sites are needed. Is Wiltshire littered with dozens and dozens of Travellers looking for somewhere to go? No, is the answer to your question, Mr. Chope—had you asked it, which you did not although I could see it in your face. Wiltshire is not particularly littered with large numbers of caravans looking for somewhere to go, so why is North Wiltshire district council—and the other district council, to which I shall refer in an moment—being asked to make permanent provision for large numbers of Gypsy caravans? It is because of a rather peculiar document called the regional spatial strategy. Incidentally, I do not think that we live in a region. I do not believe in regions or in the so-called south-west region. I certainly do not believe in an unelected, appointed, unanswerable, peculiar organisation called the South West regional assembly. I have no clue what that organisation is. I have never been there; I have never seen its minutes. That organisation is not elected and it is not answerable to the electorate in any shape, size or form. However, whoever the people at the South West regional assembly are, they have produced a document called the regional spatial strategy, and, off the top of their heads and for reasons best known to themselves, they have stated in that document that somehow or other Wiltshire has to take large numbers of these sites.

That seems to me to be fundamentally undemocratic. If the councillors at Wiltshire county council or North Wiltshire district council say, "It is our duty as a council to make provision for these people in the same way that we must house the homeless," that would be perfectly fine. They are elected councillors and if they get it wrong by having too many or too few sites, they are removed from office in the next election because they have done a bad job as councillors. The South West regional assembly has no such democratic accountability. The people there have been appointed and we do not know who they are or why they are doing this.

The South West regional assembly is not acting entirely off its own bat; it is replying to a document that the Government produced last year. That consultation document is entitled "The Road Ahead", which is appropriately titled for a Gypsy consultation—although we are not talking about being on the road ahead; we are talking about people settling down for long periods in fixed encampments. In that document, the Government concluded that they wanted 4,000 new pitches across England. Do we know why they want 4,000 new pitches across England? Not really.

I have a number of questions to ask about how the Government came up with that figure that I shall come back to in a moment. The Government said that they want 4,000 pitches across England and they dished them out to the regional assemblies. The South West regional assembly divided the pitches up among the counties; the counties divided them up among the districts; and in a wonderfully obscure, Stalinist, centralist way, the conclusion is that North Wiltshire district council needs 48 new pitches. That is not because there are sufficient Gypsies to fill 48 pitches or because we need them, but simply because something called the South West regional assembly has answered some centralised Government diktat and has concluded that it should do so.

[Mr. James Gray]

I mentioned that there were two or three things about which I felt unhappy in relation to the methodology used by the South West regional assembly. Without delaying hon. Members too much, I shall mention one or two of those issues. First, each county had to produce a Gypsy and Traveller accommodation assessment, which is a GTAA to those of us in the know. The truth is that each of those GTAAs differ from county to county, and it is up to each county to set up its own GTAA, which undermines the process by which the assessment is arrived at. Secondly, the GTAAs are based on consultations with Gypsies and Travellers, which one might say is reasonable enough. As the report from the panel states:

"this helps inform the process of allocating pitch numbers to each district."

However, the likelihood is that Gypsies and Travellers will exaggerate the number of pitches that they need. They are hardly likely to say that they want fewer than they need—they are likely to exaggerate it.

The South West regional assembly went on to suggest that the compound growth of the Gypsy and Traveller population will be 3 per cent. a year until 2016, which is why we have to come up with so many sites. If my arithmetic is correct, those figures mean that the Gypsy and Traveller population will have increased by some 27 per cent. by 2016—3 per cent. compounded through until 2016. The Government say that the British population will grow by 8 per cent. in the same period. Perhaps the Minister will tell us why it is presumed that the Gypsy population will grow three times faster than the settled population because there is no logic in that at all. I recently had a meeting with some Gypsies and I said to them, "Where are all these extra Gypsies coming from?" and in a rather nice Wiltshire understatement they said, "From their mothers, I reckon." I suppose that is true—although that would happen no faster than the settled population.

In justifying its figures, the panel criticised the Wiltshire GTAA. It said that North Wiltshire has produced unrealistically low figures because of "the strength of enforcement action carried out by the County having displaced need from the County to elsewhere".

So, lower figures have been produced because of the effectiveness of enforcement action. In other words, the police have done their job and moved people on when they are illegally parked, and because they have done so rather well, we need more sites. The police were simply doing their job and the report has criticised them for that. It goes on.

It seems that in some areas, the individuals who undertook the survey work were people whom the local Gypsy and Traveller communities distrusted—well, it would not be much good if they had used their mates. It seems perfectly reasonable for people in authority dispassionately to assess how many places are needed. The report goes on to refer to Travellers living in houses who might want to return to caravans if new sites are provided. Is it necessarily a duty of society to provide people who have decided to settle and who have been allocated permanent housing, presumably by the local authority or housing association, with sites? Is it up to us to spend large amounts of Government money—incidentally we are talking about £70 million of Government money altogether across the nation—to provide sites so that we can encourage people to leave houses and go back to their preferred way of life in caravans? I am not sure that it is and I am not sure that the voter out there thinks it is either.

The whole approach to this seems to be flawed. The way in which they came up with these figures and allocated them around the area seems to be flawed. The Government want 4,000 new pitches, as I said. North Wiltshire alone will increase its number of pitches by 48, plus 12 transit pitches. Each of those pitches has two caravans, so roughly speaking, there will be a further 120 caravans in North Wiltshire. In addition, they want 14 more pitches in Swindon, 18 in Salisbury, five in Kennet, and 14 in West Wiltshire. There will be 200 more caravans in the county of Wiltshire, and driving around Wiltshire, as I do all weekend, I am not aware of 200 caravans hanging around Wiltshire wondering where to go. I do not believe the figures are accurate; they are a centralist, Stalinist estimate made by the Government and the South West regional assembly, and I challenge the Government to justify them.

I will not enter into discussions about the merits and demerits of the six sites that North Wiltshire district council has proposed. Each of them is unacceptable to the people living there and I am inclined to think that all of them are quite wrong and none of them should be chosen. My problem is not so much with where they should be, but with the principle that lies behind the way in which the Government are saying they should be provided. My view is that the provision of Gypsy encampments fulfils a kind of Parkinson's law: the more sites we have, the more Gypsies appear to fill them. As evidence of that, let me cite a few statistics. When the Labour Government passed the Caravan Sites Act 1968, they conducted a census and concluded that there were about 3,000 Gypsy caravans in England and that it was right that we should provide 3,000 pitches for them to go to. We did so; indeed while the Act was in place, we provided not 3,000 but a total of 7,000 pitches—some two and a half times the number required. Theoretically, that should have meant that all the Gypsy caravans in England were more than happily accommodated, yet by the time that the Conservative Government repealed the Act in 1995, there were 12,614 caravans in England, more than half of which were illegally parked. By July 2007, 17,134 caravans had been counted in England. We went from 3,000 to 12,000 to 17,000 caravans.

The paper produced by the independent taskforce says that it does not know how many Gypsies there are in England; estimates vary enormously, from 82,000 to 300,000. Incidentally, that paper gets the count of caravans wrong. It says that there were 16,000 caravans at the time to which I referred, so the authors get their statistics wrong in the introduction to the Government paper. I am not sure how their statistical analysis can be relied on beyond that.

We believe that there are very substantial numbers of Gypsies around. The number seems to increase exponentially. We have gone from 3,000 caravans in 1968 to at least 17,000 caravans today, with possibly up to 300,000 people living in them—an astonishing series of figures. The provision of sites—I think that there are now about 12,000 pitches in England—has done nothing to accommodate them. In other words, the more sites we provide, the more Travellers appear.

That brings me back to my original point about who these people are. Quite a significant number of them are new age travellers of one kind or another—people who have chosen to live a nomadic lifestyle, rather than having been born into it. In philosophical terms, perhaps one should consider whether it is right that society is required to provide, at large public expense, sites for people who have chosen to go and live in broken-down old buses around our countryside. I am not certain that that is something that the taxpayer would necessarily ask us to do.

All of that is without considering how many Gypsies around the world may be considering coming to this country. This is how the people who produced the paper went about their business: they put their finger in the air and came up with an imaginary number, then local authorities were required to provide sites for that imaginary number of people. That is like asking how many people are living in Europe today, how many might want to come and live in England and therefore how many new houses we should require local authorities to build for them. It is an absurd calculation and it should not be done; it should be done precisely the other way around. We should be saying to local authorities, "It is your duty to provide for people of a settled disposition, just as it is your duty to provide for people of a travelling disposition. If you don't—if you provide too few sites—then come the next district council election or unitary council election"—as is the case in Wiltshire—"the people of your area will judge you on your ability as councillors to have carried out your statutory duties." We should be working from the bottom up—with councillors being given the responsibility to do those things—rather than working from the top down, which is absurd. In concreting over the countryside, as the Government are requiring local authorities to do to provide sites, they are also concreting over local people's opinions on the subject.

I look forward to hearing from my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham from the Front Bench shortly. In 1995, while we were in government—I declare an interest: I was special adviser to the Secretary of State for the Environment at the time, which is why I take a keen interest in these matters—we did, after all, abolish the requirement on local authorities to provide sites. Let me talk about what might happen in the event that there is a Conservative Government two years from now. Who knows? I suppose that that is at least theoretically possible. I would not want to offend the Minister by putting it any more strongly than that.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Iain Wright): It is only theoretical.

Mr. Gray: Theoretically, if there were to be a Conservative Government two years from now, I would very much hope that we would once again say to local authorities, "We in government will not take a centralist approach to making provision for Gypsies and Travellers. It is you, the local authorities, whose duty it is to house the homeless, which you do extremely well by and large across the nation, and it is your duty to provide suitable accommodation for those Travellers in your area." There is no reason why we should provide Traveller accommodation for people from outside the area. We want to provide proper accommodation in the proper place for Wiltshire Gypsies, but not for Gypsies from elsewhere.

I look forward to hearing how the Minister will try to answer some of the statistical points about the need for Gypsy sites and the points about the way in which they are provided. I also look forward to hearing from my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham. I hope that I can tell my constituents in North Wiltshire that two years from now there just might be a glimmer of light at the end of the tunnel.

2.55 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on securing the debate. I think that he is being unduly cautious in his political calculations about the future. I would be rather more bullish than he has been. However, we are talking about the present rather than the future, and I congratulate him on the way in which he presented his case. He said much of what I would have wished to say; I will not repeat his comments, but will just add one or two of my own.

On the question of figures, I am highly suspicious of Government predictions for the number of people coming into this country, and I have a right to be. I was my party's Front-Bench spokesman when we considered the European accession treaty—a slightly different context. We talked about whether we should do what the Germans and French had done and place a seven-year restriction on the numbers of people who could come from within Europe to this country. The then Foreign Secretary, who is now the Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor, assured me that the Government had done a firm calculation and that only 13,000 people were going to come as a result of the accession treaty. However, according to the last figure I heard, it was about 750,000, so I think that I have a right to be suspicious of Government predictions.

This is the nub of our argument. None of us disagrees that there is a need to provide adequate accommodation and sites for the travelling people who are in this country and who belong to this country, but there is always the danger that if we overdo it, we are offering an invitation for more of those people to come from abroad to take advantage of it. That has happened, as we know, in the employment market and it could equally happen in the travelling population.

I am very careful when talking about this issue, because it is emotive. I shall make just one or two comments and I will do so on the basis of experience. For four years, I was the Minister responsible for the environment in Scotland, in charge of our policy on travelling people, at a time when there was a requirement, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire said, to provide accommodation. I learnt certain lessons from that experience. The first was that it is vital not to impose sites for travelling people on areas that simply will never come to terms with them. We made that mistake. We all went around saying, "Ah, but you know, in a year or two everybody will be used to it," but my experience was that they did not get used to it. If sites were in the wrong place to begin with, they remained in the wrong place, and instead of providing a reasonable environment for the travelling people on those sites, we provided a hostile environment because the local people never came around to the idea of their presence.

[Mr. Michael Ancram]

I am in an interesting position because although none of the sites that my hon. Friend mentioned is in my constituency, one of them is across the road from a lot of new houses in Calne—he mentioned the town meeting in Calne. Those houses have been built to try to restore some of the prosperity of a town that has suffered badly over the years. At the very big meeting last night, there was hostility. I am told that it was a meeting at which there was no meeting of minds, and judging by the detailed account that I had this morning, it was certainly not what I would call consultation. If part of the policy of the local council, or the policy of the regional assembly or, indeed, the overall policy of the Government is to disregard that hostility, it will build into that area a social problem and an economic problem that will not go away. We will not have served the travelling people well by doing that.

There is another aspect to the matter. I am receiving a lot of complaints from people in that area about how the value of the houses that they have bought is falling because of the housing market at the moment. That is fairly general. The one thing that we know from experience is that putting a Traveller site in the wrong area, perhaps alongside newly built houses, tends to bring down house values. People have been writing to me saying that they are already being hit on house values and face the possibility of negative equity, and that the chances are that the problem will get even worse. Those are the issues that need to be taken into account.

The last point that I want to make it this: travelling people are travelling people because they want to travel. That brings me to another of the lessons that I learnt when I was in charge of this matter in Scotland. The Government provided sites, and as Minister I used to visit them. If I went in the winter, they were reasonably full; if I went in the summer they were empty. Why? Because the people on those sites wanted to travel. Their whole culture was about travelling. Providing the sites did not remove the problem of travelling people in the summer, as they were still on the roads looking for places to park. I suddenly realised that that arid policy was never going to achieve its purpose. I fear, given what we have heard about the regional spatial strategy and from the regional assembly, that we are about to make the same mistake again.

I fully endorse what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire. In Wiltshire, we have a reasonably stable Gypsy-Romany population. I have some of them in my constituency; I know them. They are equally alarmed at the prospect of provision suddenly being made that will bring a totally different type of travelling people into the area. They know that if the problems that I foresee come about because of the approach that is taken, the relations that they have created with their local communities will be damaged vicariously.

I urge the Government to consider closely the requirement for regional assemblies or councils to provide that type of site. We are not looking at a short-term measure, but at something that could have a very long-term consequence. It would damage the lives not only of the Traveller people themselves but of the communities upon whom they might be imposed.

3.2 pm

Dr. Andrew Murrison (West Bury) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on introducing the debate. It is an emotive subject, and he discussed it in a balanced and thoughtful way. It seems to me that the debate revolves around planning law and the importance of an even playing field and proper assessment of need.

Before debating any of that, however, we need to discuss definitions. My hon. Friend did so very well. The Government clearly feel the same way because their Task Group on Site Provision and Enforcement reported in December last year, saying that > "Ministers should meet Gypsies and Travellers to discuss their concerns about the different definitions of Gypsies and Travellers used for planning and housing purposes."

That is absolutely right. It will be interesting to hear from the Minister about those meetings and what definitions were forthcoming as a result.

Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire, I have met Romany Gypsies in my constituency and spoken with them. They are indeed concerned, as my right hon. and learned Friend pointed out, about being lumped in with other Travellers, particularly what I might call the new-age type of traveller and those who could be described as urban drop-outs. Romanies rightly maintain that they are a distinct ethnic group, and they are recognised as such. They have distinctive family traditions, and they maintain a nomadic way of life. In Wiltshire and elsewhere, they are a settled part of the rural scene. Over the centuries they have often been vilified, but nevertheless they are part of that scene. In Wiltshire, they are a well accepted part of it, and they are most welcome.

We need to realise that the travelling lifestyle is quite costly. In 2006-07, the Department for Communities and Local Government made £56 million available and, in its report of December 2007, the Department said that it was apparently on course to yield 450 additional pitches. If you are generous and round that up to 500 pitches, it comes out at £112,000 a pitch—a large sum, particularly in the context of the debate in my constituency about the provision of low-cost housing for rent. Given that we are talking about large sums per unit, we need to be certain that the needs assessment has been done correctly.

Mr. Gray: I do not want to embarrass my hon. Friend by correcting him, but I think that he put the zero in the wrong place. If there were 5,000 pitches, it would work out at £11,200 each, but it is still an awful lot of money.

Dr. Murrison: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but my information came from a Library note on the subject. We could debate the matter further, but as he says, it is a significant sum. The point that I am trying to make, rather than debating absolute sums and comparing them with the cost of providing low-cost housing for rent, is that even thought it is a substantial amount, we need to ensure that needs are properly met.

We have the testimony of members of the Gypsy or Traveller community. One Wiltshire Traveller is on record as saying that "The whole point of being travellers is to have freedom over where we stay and this is something the council don't seem to understand."

That, of course, underlines the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes. It seems that the need is not necessarily being addressed. We should also debate the difference between needs and aspirations, which is important for the reasons so graphically illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire. We need to consider people's wishes about who they might want to be living next door in a settled way. It is important that we consider that point.

Travellers as a group have a reputation for being somewhat uncomfortable and uneasy neighbours. They are characterised as being likely to leave in their wake some degree of mayhem and squalor—frankly, they are seen as a burden. They are often attended by a reputation for criminality, but as we heard today that is unfair and misleading. It is a tribute to the easy-going and generally permissive nature of our settled population that we accommodate that sometimes somewhat challenging way of life. It is absolutely right that we should do so.

However, the law is the law. The frustration that many of our constituents feel, particularly about planning law, is caused by the fact that there appears to be an uneven playing field. That is clearly wrong. We need to ensure that the law applies equally to all. The representations that I have received from my constituents on the matter suggest that there is a perception that undue favours are being given to the Traveller population and that illegal encampments can sometimes perversely be rewarded, perhaps implicitly, by the type of provisions that we are discussing today—provisions that may or may not adequately reflect the needs of the Traveller population.

3.8 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray). From time to time, he is also an hon. friend. We have been brothers in arms more than once.

Mr. Iain Wright: Tell us more.

Lembit Öpik: It is none of your business. I am sorry, Mr. Chope, but it is your business; I meant that it is none of the Minister's business. I shall tell you later.

The hon. Member for North Wiltshire raises an interesting matter, one that was raised in a recent debate in relation to another part of the country. I listened with great interest to what was said by the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), a man with governmental experience on the subject in Scotland. I also enjoyed the contribution of the third of this triumvirate of Conservative speakers, the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison).

Call it what you will—a lifestyle choice, a tradition or an ethnic group—the Gypsy community is easy to define and is an established part of British life. Unfortunately, Gypsies suffer the poorest life chances of all ethnic minority communities. On top of that, community tensions, which have already been alluded to and do not need repetition, can be associated with the location of Travellers.

Access to public services, including education and health, continues to be an issue. There is also a prolific number of illegal sites, and that is the issue at the heart of today's debate. Such sites are difficult to control, and moving Gypsies on simply decreases their quality of life, which is already low. At the same time, Conservative and, indeed, Liberal Democrat local authorities oppose the six proposed sites in Wootton Bassett, Chippenham, Calne and Corsham because of the lack of consultation. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire has already covered those points, so I can spare hon. Members the arduous task of listening to them being repeated, as things unfortunately often are in these debates.

The hon. Gentleman made the interesting observation that it was a Conservative Government who removed the duty on councils to provide statutory Gypsy sites, but I take a different view of the matter. Between 1994 and 2000, 49 caravan sites were closed, and those closures have contributed to the current situation. They have tended to result in land being acquired or used, as well as in trespassing, and it costs the police £18 million a year to deal with that. Today's debate is not particularly about the decisions that a Conservative Government made 13 or 14 years ago, but there is a constructive debate to be had about the issue. On another occasion, we could perhaps consider whether the Government should have greater responsibility for requiring mandatory sites to be established.

Mr. Gray: The hon. Gentleman is indeed my friend, as is the Minister—in fact, we had lunch together yesterday. So all of us in the Chamber are friends.

Mr. Iain Wright: Don't tell everyone.

Mr. Gray: The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) is confusing two or three things. The abolition of the Caravan Sites Act in 1995 removed the requirement on local authorities to provide sites in answer to further demand. The 49 sites that have been closed have therefore been closed because of lack of demand or because they were past their sell-by dates. Furthermore, the £18 million to which the hon. Gentleman referred represents the police costs involved in moving on illegally parked Gypsies. That is an enforcement and planning cost and has nothing to do with the repeal of the 1968 Act.

Lembit Öpik: On the first point, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and I am pleased that I have not pushed too hard on the issue. I have been looking at this field of legislation this week, so I will hold fire until I have finished reading about it and I will take in good faith what he says. However, the second point is related to today's debate, because the £18 million is connected with the issue of Gypsy sites. It represents the cost that we have incurred by not having a particularly sustainable strategy for dealing with sites. The biggest shock in what the hon. Gentleman said, however, was his revelation that he had had lunch with the Minister. The Minister was very coy about that, and, frankly, I am shocked. I expect a similar favour at some point, as long as it is worth less than £500, so that I do not have to put it in the Register of Members' Interests.

[Lembit Öpik]

Authorised sites are vital for community cohesion, and that has a bearing on the bill to the police. If we have fewer unauthorised sites, enforcement is easier for local authorities. Authorised sites also ease community tensions, as long as there is proper consultation. In addition, managed authorised sites allow for easier access to public and financial services, which would improve the quality of life of Travellers.

Authorised sites could also have the interesting financial consequence of enabling councils to force Gypsies to pay council tax. There are issues with that, but the underlying point is that authorised sites need not be free and could be maintained by rents and licence fees. Local authorities do not even need to buy them.

The numbers of authorised caravan camps have decreased, and about 90 per cent. of planning applications by Gypsies are refused, which is one reason why they end up camping illegally. At the macro level, therefore, there are strategic questions to be answered. Perhaps the Minister can shed some light on how Government policy will become more sustainable. He alluded to that in our previous debate in this Chamber, but perhaps he can tell us more about it.

I should tell the hon. Member for North Wiltshire that I am very familiar with Romania, which is a country that I love—[Laughter.] There is an individual Romanian that I love, too. On all the occasions that I have been there, however, I have never seen a long queue of caravans waiting to come to North Wiltshire at the first sign of an increase in the number of authorised sites.

Nevertheless, I must sympathise with the hon. Gentleman because his constituency appears to be bearing the brunt of the regional spatial strategy. The plan is to increase the number of Gypsy encampments by 15 per cent. in the south-west, but by 50 per cent. in North Wiltshire. There is no reason based on natural justice why that should happen. We must ensure that the distribution of sites across the region is even and fair. The Minister is obliged to explain to the hon. Gentleman how the Government have allowed this situation to come about and, more importantly, what action they will take—probably in partnership with local authorities—to ease the pressure on his constituency. The current proposals do not make sense and are bound to increase local tensions.

Was there a lack of consultation? Gypsies must be involved in finding an alternative site, but so must the local community. A huge number of residents attended the meetings in Wootton Bassett this month and last month and signed up to the six-week consultation, which suggests that consultation has not been extensive enough.

There seem to be double standards regarding the Lindisfarne proposal. I understand—the hon. Member for North Wiltshire can confirm whether this is the case—that residents were told that the area was a conservation site. Those who had tried to extend their gardens were denied permission to do so, but were then told that the area would be proposed for use as an authorised camping site. If that is the case—I seek his guidance on this—it is hardly surprising that there are tensions.

Mr. Gray: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point and he is quite right about the Lindisfarne site. I have gone to great lengths to avoid arguing for or against any of the six sites that are being consulted on, and there are good reasons for saying that none of them is the right place to put a site. The report that proposed them came up with the wrong sites; it should have come up with sites in the middle of the countryside, not ones that were attached to towns, as all the proposed sites are.

Lembit Öpik: Given the sensitivities in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, I fully understand why he has taken that sensible view. I used the Lindisfarne example simply to demonstrate the contradictory messages that are being put out, with the unsurprising consequence that there is resentment among local residents, who do not feel that the system is fair.

I have looked into the cost of eviction, and it is obvious that the benefits of authorised sites far outweigh the cost of creating them. The £18 million that the police have spent on eviction is part of that cost. As I mentioned in our previous debate, Bristol city council reduced its annual enforcement costs from £200,000 a year to £5,000 a year by providing a £425,000 authorised site. Moving Gypsies several times over is expensive and serves only to increase problems. The evidence shows that having authorised sites not only represents a tension-reducing strategy, but leads to a cost saving.

Authorised sites would also assist the police in monitoring and enforcing the law. All of us who have looked at the issue will be aware of the Stanley park incident. As a result of the absence of an authorised site, Gypsies ended up disrupting a football game that had been scheduled for the youth teams at Stanley park. The police reached an accommodation with the Gypsies, but it should not be for the police to make such tactical decisions; the regulatory framework should provide us with reliable solutions, so that things do not reach that stage.

I have mentioned the idea that authorised sites would encourage more Gypsies and Travellers into the country, but I think that it is unfounded. What is actually happening is that people from unauthorised sites are gravitating to the authorised sites that have been established. However, the same issues affect countries across Europe. Perhaps the Minister can comment on what we can do Europe-wide to deal with the issue. He will know that things have got far worse in other countries. In Italy, caravans just outside Rome were actually set alight by the local community. These issues are not, therefore, unique to Britain.

The existence of Gypsies is nothing new. The Gypsy lifestyle is rather more traditional than having a flat in London. In that sense, Gypsies have every reason to be respected and to expect facilities to be made available so that they can pursue their lifestyle. As the hon. Member for North Wiltshire quite rightly said, these are not horrible people. They are lovely people who have a breadth of experience and culture that serves to add to the social fabric of the country and not take away from it. However, there must be sufficient force in the regulatory system to make them responsible citizens. Authorised sites would allow the police and local government to create a partnership that is sustainable in the longer term. It would also allow the police to act swiftly in cases of trespass rather than face the delay that weakens the case for prosecution, as was made clear in the Stanley park incident. Some £18 million a year is spent in pointless enforcement costs. That money could be much better used in other ways.

In conclusion, I ask the Minister to comment on the very good points made by hon. Members today and to indicate whether he intends to consider the issue on a pan-European basis, because there is a degree of migration from one country to another. Such consideration would help us to see whether best practice in other countries could be reapplied here.

3.20 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): It is with some trepidation that I tiptoe into this male bonding session. I congratulate the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) on his experience in Romania. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on obtaining this very important debate. The issue of Travellers applies not just to Wiltshire, but much more widely. It even affects—dare I say?—someone who represents a London constituency because we also have a travelling population. The borough of Bromley has long been the home for the showmen during the winter, and they are a key part of the travelling population. So, we, too, in London have our experiences. I have visited a Travellers' site in Lewisham. Getting the amount of caravans on to that site was a miracle of engineering. It was exceedingly tight, but they managed it.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) also made a contribution, telling us about his very deep experience of Traveller sites in Scotland. His points were valid because they can also be applied to England. My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) made a helpful contribution about costing and the imposition of costs on council tax payers.

I have great sympathy with those hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire, who have illegal encampments in their constituencies. From time to time, many of us have suffered from such encampments and experienced the ugly scenes when Travellers resist being moved on. Some have experienced the difficult situation in which Travellers have to be moved on because they are causing a nuisance within the local community.

I hope that my hon. Friend will be relieved to hear that when we are in Government, which will be sooner rather than later, we will conduct a review of the Human Rights Act 1998 and apply it to the situation of Travellers to ensure that the planning laws are applied equally across the population. I hope that that small assurance will be useful to my hon. Friends.

The comment was made that so much of this matter is down to planning law. Therefore, we will also deal with the issues to do with that law. As my hon. Friends know, we abhor the top-down imposition of targets, whether they relate to Traveller sites or the increase in the number of houses that we have to provide. We will get rid of the regional spatial strategies and we will ensure that local councils and local communities are on top of the development of their community so that it suits them rather than the Government.

I, too, will join the calls from everybody on the Opposition Benches for an explanation of how the Government have reached their target figures and how they have imposed them through the regional spatial strategies. I must warn my hon. Friends that, when the Housing and Regeneration Bill goes through, the regional assemblies will no longer have power over housing numbers. Because a number of councillors were nominated on to those regional assemblies, there was an element of democratic responsibility. However, that will go and the power will be handed over to the regional development agencies. The planning powers will also go with it under the new Planning Bill, unless we can bring it to a grinding halt, hopefully in the Lords—the Minister may like to take that point on board. We will see completely unelected quangos imposing housing and planning targets on unwilling populations.

My right hon. and learned Friend, who made the point about the Traveller sites being in entirely the wrong place, will know very well that, when we have the centralised target-driven system, the chances are that the site will be in the wrong place. Since the 1960s, we have been grappling with developments that have been in the wrong place, whether they are Traveller encampments or town centres. That has had a very negative effect on many of our communities, and we want to see that changed. However, we are convinced that the Government's proposals for centralised control will not achieve what they want to achieve. Sullen resentment is possibly the best way to describe the mood. Potentially, we can see a very inflamed situation. The meetings held in my hon. Friends' constituencies provided an indication of how inflamed the population can be about the wrong sort of proposal and consultation.

We also plan to make intentional trespass a criminal offence. We believe that it changes the balance of law in a way that offends a local community. It gives rights and responsibilities in a way that is unacceptable to the settled community.

We also want to stop irresponsible land speculation. By that I mean the movement on to a site over a weekend, and the instant digging for drains, standpipes and electrical supplies. Again, that outrages the local community and, in turn, ensures that it will not accept a group of Travellers. Therefore, we have to ensure that, if we are going to see a travelling population that has a settled relationship with its local community, the local community is accepting of the Traveller population as much as the Traveller population wishes to settle, even temporarily, in one place. As was so wisely said, Travellers travel and they will not necessarily be on a site permanently.

Crucially, when we come into Government, we have to ensure that it is local people and local councils who feel in control of the provision of sites. As has been said, in Wiltshire, there is an acceptance of Travellers. There is an appreciation of what they add to the local community and culture. Therefore, if the proposal is accepted locally, consulted on properly and if the site is properly positioned and considered, one can see the local community accepting a proper settled Travellers' encampment. However, if the will of local people is not there, I foresee a continuation of the problem. There will be hostile receptions—I saw this myself when I represented Hastings and Rye which has a number of travelling communities—and it could potentially lead to violence on both sides. That is completely unacceptable in the kind of world that we wish to live in.

[Mrs. Jacqui Lait]

I congratulate my hon. Friend once again and I hope that my brief comments help in his constituency.

Mr. Gray: There is plenty of time for the Minister to expand on the subject at length so we need not worry too much about delaying the start of his speech. Will my hon. Friend be a little clearer? In informal discussions, my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), the shadow Secretary of State, indicated that he would seek ways in which to remove the requirement on local authorities to provide permanent Gypsy encampments that are not desired by local people; in other words, to leave it to local councillors to decide whether to provide such sites. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham was saying the same thing but, for those in Wiltshire who are watching this debate, will she be absolutely clear and precise that we will remove that requirement when we come to power?

Mrs. Lait: I am happy to clarify that. It is easy to fall into jargon, but merely abolishing the regional spatial strategy indicates that there will be no top-down targeting or pressure on councils to provide a set number over which they have no control. I am sorry that I used jargon—we all know who is to blame for it, and it is not those on our side of the Chamber. I reassure my hon. Friend that councils will be in control of the process. Indeed, it will be a challenge to councils to initiate and involve people, so that they can develop a vibrant community that will allow all groups and people to live together in harmony. That will be a big challenge, but I am sure councils will rise to it if they feel that there is virtue and value to their community for so doing.

I commend my hon. Friend for initiating the debate and I hope that my few words have been of some help.

3.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Iain Wright): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship once again, Mr. Chope—it is always good to see you.

I congratulate the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on securing the debate and those who spoke on their contributions. I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman secured the debate because it gives us the chance to debate Gypsy and Traveller policy for the second time in less than a month, following the enjoyable and important debate on 22 May on the provision and enforcement of Gypsy and Traveller sites to which I and the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), among others, contributed.

I shall begin as I did in that debate by talking about the importance of responsibility. Let me dispel the myth that has been mentioned a number of times today and that is perpetuated in some quarters that there are somehow strict laws in place for the settled community and a laissez-faire attitude to the Gypsy and Traveller communities. That was mentioned by the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) in his first-class contribution. Let me put the record straight: everybody in this country lives under one set of laws. Our expected standards of behaviour extend to everybody in society, not just a narrow or selective band. A range of powers are in place and are available to landowners, local authorities and the police to deal with unauthorised encampments.

Mr. Gray rose—

Mr. Wright: Let me finish this point. We have strengthened police powers to tackle unauthorised encampments and offered clear guidance to local authorities on how to use them. We are currently preparing guidance for publication later this year on how those powers can be used to tackle situations in which Gypsies and Travellers are responsible for, or victims of, antisocial behaviour. I hope that we can get away from the myth that there is one rule for one and one rule for another.

Dr. Murrison: I am sure that the Minister is correct—of course we all exist in the same legal environment. Nevertheless, he is surely not suggesting that the public perceive that there is a level playing field. If he is, he is wrong. What is he going to do to change that perception?

Mr. Wright: I shall come to the point on planning law that the hon. Gentleman made in his contribution. Let me clarify things for the record: Gypsies and Travellers are treated exactly the same as other members of society under planning law, and they are expected to obtain planning permission before starting development. I know that there are cases in the real world in which that does not happen, and I will expand on such situations later.

Mr. Gray rose—

Mr. Wright: I shall finish this point before I give way. Circular 106 does not give Gypsies and Travellers special treatment. The main theme of my contribution is that local authorities assess the housing needs of the settled community, so it is only right and proper that they also assess the housing needs of Gypsies and Travellers.

Mr. Gray: If the Minister is right that planning law treats two people in precisely the same way, will he explain why the planning inspector, speaking on behalf of the Secretary of State, has said that the Gypsies who are illegally camped on their own land at Minety in my constituency can remain unless the district council provides accommodation elsewhere, whereas, just down the road, an organic farmer who currently lives in a caravan on 30 acres of organic farm, has been told that, unless she removes the caravan immediately, enforcement procedures will follow and that she cannot appeal the decision? That demonstrably is not a level playing field. The Human Rights Act 1998 is relevant here: the people in the Gypsy caravans have human rights, but the organic farmer who is being evicted does not.

Mr. Wright: I do not know the circumstances of the two cases to which the hon. Gentleman refers. As he will appreciate, it would be entirely wrong of me to comment on something when I am not aware of the situation. Suffice it to say that there is one rule for all, and we must abide by it. I am not in a position to discuss the circumstances that he described.

Mr. Gray: I was using those cases as an example. Will the Minister send a message to the inspector who is sitting in Chippenham on 8 July to consider the Minety Gypsies? The Minister said a moment ago that the inspector must consider their rights, duties and responsibilities in precisely the same way—no difference of any kind whatever—as he would those of a member of the settled community who is in a similar position. We will give the Hansard report of the debate to the inspector on 8 July, so will the Minister confirm that he must consider the Minety Gypsies in precisely the same way as he would consider any other person who parks a caravan illegally on their own ground?

Mr. Wright: The policy framework that we have put in place means that a local authority assesses in a strategic, considered and—crucially—evidence-based way the strategic housing needs of their area, which include the accommodation needs of the Gypsy and Traveller communities. That is exactly the right approach. That is how we should proceed regarding local development frameworks and higher up in the regional spatial strategies. I do not wish to be drawn further on the details of the case.

Mr. Gray: The Minister is extremely generous in giving way, but he has answered my question in a completely different way. His point was that, under planning law, people of a travelling disposition and those of a settled disposition must be treated identically. When challenged on that with regard to the inquiry that is coming up on 8 July, he said that the question of assessing needs is the same whether a person is a Traveller or not. However, I was not talking about assessing needs; I was talking about planning law. I wanted an assurance that planning law, in detail, precisely, applies identically to the Traveller population and the settled population. I ask again: does planning law apply equally to Travellers as to anybody else? The inspector on 8 July will be listening to what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Wright: I will not be drawn into the details. The Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government has a quasi-judicial role with regard to planning, so I will not be drawn into a discussion about what may or may not happen on 8 July. Suffice it to say that, as everybody will agree, there is an urgent and identifiable need for more Gypsy and Traveller sites, not only in the south-west of England, but throughout the country. Successive caravan counts have shown that nearly a quarter of Gypsies and Travellers who live in caravans have no authorised place to live. That is not acceptable, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire mentioned in his excellent contribution.

Mrs. Lait: I have no intention of getting the Minister to concentrate on one particular case because I accept that he cannot comment on it. However, I would be grateful if he could tell us what he and the Government plan to do about retrospective planning. Gypsies or Travellers will move on to a site, occupy it and apply for retrospective planning permission, knowing full well that it will be several years before anything can be done and that enforcement will not necessarily follow. That is key.

Mr. Wright: That is an important point. I will come to the general policy framework, particularly in terms of enforcement and provision, in a moment. It is crucial. I hope to be able to address the hon. Lady's points later in my contribution.

Lembit Öpik: Perhaps the Minister's contribution will resolve this matter. He must accept that there is a double standard, albeit for understandable reasons. The travelling community must live somewhere, and faced with the preposterous prospect of trying to move Travellers on indefinitely, the police come to accommodations. The Government's challenge is to frame legislation so that that de facto bending of the rules need not happen, because it serves the travelling community no better than the communities in which they reside.

Mr. Wright: Absolutely. I agree entirely. That was mentioned in our debate on 22 May. I think that we discussed whether it was acceptable for Gypsy and Traveller communities to disregard planning law. I said that it was not acceptable, but that it was understandable given the shortage of authorised sites. It is important that the Government ensure that the policy framework in which all interested parties operate is the correct and appropriate one. The task group chaired by Sir Brian Briscoe, to which I think the hon. Member for Westbury referred, considered that closely.

I do not want to make party political points, but this matter has been mentioned on a number of occasions. It is clear that a great many problems of community tension over unauthorised encampments are consequences of legislation passed by the previous Conservative Government. As has been said on a number of occasions, the legislation removed the duty on local authorities to provide sites for Gypsies and Travellers. Those communities were expected to provide for themselves without any thought for how they might do so. Even those Gypsies and Travellers with the means to do so found that talking to planning authorities led to discrimination, pre-emptive action and ultimately planning refusal.

It is simply no good for politicians or others, whether in the media or elsewhere, to damn unauthorised camps while failing to provide a workable solution. To tackle the problem, we introduced in the Housing Act 2004 a requirement for local authorities to address the reasons for unauthorised encampments and establish pitch needs through the preparation of accommodation assessments for Gypsies and Travellers. Most of the assessments have been completed, and they are beginning to feed into the regional spatial strategy process.

The policy framework established in the 2004 Act was examined carefully by the task group, which concluded that the policies established by this Government were sound, that local authorities had sufficient powers to deal with breaches of planning control and unauthorised developments and that it was right for the Government to place a duty on authorities to identify land. It is vital to have some degree of political consensus on this important and emotive topic, so I was pleased that during the debate on 22 May, the hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Robert Neill), who led for the Opposition on that occasion, confirmed that there is growing political consensus.

[Mr. Iain Wright]

The hon. Gentleman said that

"there is a sensible way forward through the recognition and identification of proper sites. That is the correct approach for us to adopt." [Official Report, Westminster Hall, 22 May 2008; Vol. 476, c. 144WH.]

I suggest, with a hint of cheekiness in my tone, that that approach was also accepted by the hon. Member for North Wiltshire shortly after the enactment of the Housing Act 2004, in an Adjournment debate on the provision of sites in Minety in his constituency.

Mrs. Lait: I suspect—in fact, I know—that the approach taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Robert Neill) would be very different from that taken by the Minister. We would not impose top-down provision; we would ensure that local communities themselves make the decision.

Mr. Wright: I will probe the hon. Lady's policy in a moment, if I may, but before I do so, I will quote the hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst in the debate from 2004 on gypsy camps at Minety:

"The pattern appears to be that Gypsies do not to want to live on local authority sites, but on land that they themselves own. I rather encourage that. It seems to me to be eminently sensible to encourage them to set up their own sites legally and with proper planning permission. Local authorities ought to set aside and designate land for Gypsy encampments."

That is a particularly important sentence. He continued:

"The Gypsies could then buy that land and put an encampment on it. That seems a sensible way forward, whereas invading a site and then seeking retrospective planning permission will not work." [Official Report, Westminster Hall, 10 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 300WH.]

I am pleased by that sensible approach, but I was somewhat confused by the letter dated 15 May 2008 from the hon. Member for North Wiltshire to Lachlan Robertson of North Wiltshire district council. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but he made the letter public, so I will quote from it:

"The Government have set North Wiltshire District Council an unachievable task, namely to assess the need for such sites…and then to make provision for permanent sites for those hypothetically arriving gypsies."

I fail to see how it is inconsistent for local authorities to set aside and designate sites while assessing the need for such sites and making provision for them. On the contrary, it seems sensible and consistent. I hope that the hon. Gentleman can explain.

Mr. Gray: I shall be delighted to do so. The Minister's special adviser has done a sterling job in digging out ancient quotes that seem to me to be perfectly consistent. What I said was that it is perfectly reasonable for local authorities such as North Wiltshire district council to designate land that Gypsies could buy, so that they could then apply for proper planning permission and put their caravans there. That is absolutely fine. What we do not want is situations such as that at the Minety site, where Gypsies are illegally encamped on their own land. Nor do we want the Government, in the form of the South West regional assembly, saying, "You will take 48 pitches and 200 caravans in North Wiltshire, and you will put them on these sites, and we don't care whether those Gypsies exist or not." The two statements that the Minister's special adviser carefully dug out are perfectly consistent.

Mr. Wright: The hon. Gentleman is far too complimentary. I am too far below the pay grade to have a special adviser. I have to do the research myself, I am afraid. [Hon. Members: "Ah."] The House is very thoughtful.

The hon. Gentleman's intervention touched on a crucial argument in today's debate: that Gypsy and Traveller accommodation assessments and site provision are effectively being imposed on local areas. I disagree fundamentally. The assessments are prepared locally by local authorities. The authorities play a key role, whether individually or in partnership with other local authorities. The assessments are then considered by the regional assembly, which provides a strategic overview of need across the region, but the key part is the assessment and the evidence base of need from the local authority.

The assembly's proposals are then examined in public, which provides interested parties with every opportunity to challenge the number or distribution of proposed sites. I argue vehemently that ours is not a top-down approach. It is bottom-up. It includes a strategic approach from the regional assembly, but it is nevertheless bottom-up and can be challenged in public. That seems fairly clear.

Mr. Gray: I do not believe that the Minister can do what I am about to ask him to do, but if indeed the approach is bottom-up—if it is up to North Wiltshire district council to make the provision that it believes is necessary—will he send a message to the leader of North Wiltshire district council that he does not have to do what the South West regional assembly has told him to do but can make provision now for the Gypsy caravan sites that he believes to be necessary in North Wiltshire? Will he send that message from this debate?

Mr. Wright: I will come to that in a moment. I want to probe Conservative party policy, because it has been touched on. [Interruption.] It is an important point, because there is an element of inconsistency. I mentioned the letter written by the hon. Gentleman a month or so ago. I shall quote that letter—perhaps you will forgive the unparliamentary language, Mr. Chope—which states:

"I have had informal discussions with Eric Pickles MP, Shadow Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government"— the hon. Gentleman mentioned that—

"who has assured me that an incoming Conservative Government will seek to remove the necessity to provide sites of this kind and under these circumstances. It was after all the last Conservative Government who repealed the 1968 Gypsy Caravans Act in 1995. My strong instinct therefore is that the District Council should make representations to the Government that they are unable to comply with this requirement to provide a new gypsy encampment."

That is significant, and it shows a Front Bench pointing in opposite directions. The hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst is saying that, ultimately, the present policy framework leads to less tension and better value for taxpayers, while another states informally that he will repeal the legislation—the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire touched on this—which will lead to more tension, more unauthorised sites and more costs for decent hardworking people in terms of enforcement and short-term moving on of encampments. That is not appropriate, and I am happy to seek clarification from the hon. Member for Beckenham.

Mrs. Lait: I am happy to provide that clarification, but we are here to probe Government policy, not Conservative party policy.

There is no contradiction between the statement that the Minister read out from my hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst saying that local councils should provide—we all agree and have said so consistently throughout the past hour or so—and anything that my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) has said. The key that the Minister is eliding over in the statement from my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar is "under these circumstances". Those circumstances are the Government's top-down imposed regional spatial strategy, which produces the local development frameworks, very few of which have been agreed. The requirements of the regional spatial strategy and the local development frameworks imposed on local government is where the top-down implication comes in. It has nothing to do with local councils making their own decisions undriven by the Government.

Mr. Wright: Let me move on to talk about the policy framework and Government policy. There are two days left to contribute to the consultation on where new sites in North Wiltshire should be. I hope that the hon. Member for North Wiltshire and others will take the opportunity to reassert the earlier view that the recognition and identification of sites is just as important in 2008 as it was in 2004. We definitely need that.

The Government believe that everyone has the right to a decent home and a secure and authorised place in which to raise their families. For years, local authorities have assessed the housing needs of the settled population to plan strategically for the future requirements of their residents. That is entirely appropriate.

Local authorities identify land for all uses in their local plans, which are available so that the public can see at a glance what type of development is likely to take place in their neighbourhoods during the coming years. There is no reason why land suitable for use as Gypsy and Traveller sites should not go through the same process. It is not appropriate for housing for Gypsies and Travellers to be treated differently from housing for the settled community.

The policies that the Government have put in place ensure that our record on equality now extends to Gypsies and Travellers through the planning system, as it should. Everyone in our communities, whether they live in a house or on a Gypsy and Traveller caravan site, needs to know that local authorities are planning for the housing needs of future generations. This Government have pledged to deliver 3 million new homes by 2020. The need to provide equality of opportunity for Gypsies and Travellers is tiny in comparison. As the hon. Gentleman mentioned, we are talking about 4,000 pitches by 2011 to accommodate all caravans on all currently unauthorised sites, which means that less than 1 square mile of land is required throughout the country.

The hon. Gentleman commented on the exercise by North Wiltshire district council. I praise the council for taking steps to identify suitable locations to address the need for additional sites within its area. As I hinted, the hon. Gentleman knows that I cannot comment on the proposals, but the council's approach in recognising the need to plan proactively for authorised sites must be the right one in tackling unauthorised sites. That evidence-based approach seems to be entirely right.

I reiterate a point that I made earlier, which is important. Regional spatial strategies should be established using a robust and credible evidence base. The GTAAs to which the hon. Gentleman referred naturally form part of that evidence, but if he or any other hon. Member who has contributed today believes the evidence to be less than credible, I suggest that they make their views known through the statutory consultation process.

Lembit Öpik: I suggest a test for what the Minister said. He claims that the process that he has described will resolve the issues that we are discussing. Is he predicting that the Government's approach will resolve the specific issue in North Wiltshire that has been raised? If so, when will he see the issue resolved?

Mr. Wright: All I am saying is that I think there is a large element of consensus between the hon. Gentleman and me that the identification and provision of authorised sites ultimately improve community cohesion and reduce enforcement costs. Everyone, whether Gypsy and Traveller communities or the settled community, wins through the identification and provision of authorised sites and good management. That seems entirely reasonable, and should be carried out as part of the RSS process through the strategic assessment of need, whether it is housing in general or Gypsy and Traveller accommodation. Again, that seems entirely reasonable and sensible. I hope that the identification and provision of authorised sites will iron out as much as possible some of the problems that have been highlighted today.

The hon. Gentleman also touched on a central point that the hon. Member for North Wiltshire made about armies of people coming from eastern Europe and elsewhere to the newly provided sites. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire sensibly poured cold water on that, because there is no evidence that armies of Gypsies and Travellers are waiting to migrate to this country as soon as new sites are established.

I emphasise that accommodation assessments are already undertaken for settled housing needs, and it is only right and proper that we also assess the needs of Gypsy and Traveller residents.

Mr. Ancram: If there is no evidence on that account, was there evidence in relation to, for example, the Poles who came here after the accession treaty?

Mr. Wright: That is a wider point that I cannot comment on in three minutes, but it is an important point in terms of immigration policy.

Let me move on to how the situation in the south-west of England relates nationally to the Government's commitment to provide equality of opportunity for Gypsies and Travellers throughout the country. The panel's report recently submitted to the Secretary of State sets out how many new pitches should be provided in the south-west. I commend the work that has been undertaken in the south-west to bring forward the delivery of new pitches so far, and we will publish our proposed changes to the regional spatial strategy in due course.

[Mr. Iain Wright]

We want that progress to be replicated throughout the country. There is an established need for new houses throughout the south-west. It is right, and expected, that they will be provided. It is similarly right, and expected, that the number of new homes required will be carefully and meticulously studied. Regional spatial strategies are to be founded on a robust and credible evidence base, subject to examination in public so that everyone has the chance to comment. That is the process that has been followed in the south-west, enabling all those with an interest to probe or challenge the assessments of the need for more Gypsy and Traveller sites.

I hope that it is clear to the hon. Member for North Wiltshire and others that in this age of equality what is right and expected for members of the settled community becomes right and expected for Gypsies and Travellers too. I started by saying that there is one law for all. Gypsies and Travellers should abide by the planning system. They should apply for planning permission before developing land that they own, and local authorities have swift and appropriate enforcement action to deploy if they do not do so.

We will not see a reduction in unauthorised camping if new sites are not provided to meet the needs of the Gypsy and Traveller communities. The task group stated that, when there is a demonstrable need, local authorities should begin work on identifying sites now. I am glad that in the south-west the regional spatial strategy is close to concluding how many pitches should be provided. It will then be for local authorities such as North Wiltshire to ensure—not by a top-down approach—that they provide homes and accommodation for those who need them most.

3.59 pm

Sitting suspended.

Crimestoppers (Great Yarmouth)

4.30 pm

Mr. Anthony Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship today, Mr. Chope.

I am certainly pleased to have the opportunity to debate this subject, although I do not think that it will be very contentious. It will probably be one of the easier debates for the Home Office to respond to, because the subject is one deserving of celebration rather than one that requires the Home Office to intervene or take any particular action.

As I say, I am pleased to have secured this debate. Although the subject is Crimestoppers in Great Yarmouth, this is really a celebration of the fact that the nationally recognised and successful Crimestoppers scheme started in Great Yarmouth some 25 years, on 24 June 1983; the exact anniversary is next Tuesday. The scheme was started by Detective Inspector Mike Cole and was ably supported by the then manager of the Woolworths store in the town centre, Jim Carter; both of them are visiting Westminster Hall today to enjoy the celebrations of what was achieved in Great Yarmouth.

I want first to express my appreciation for the initiative, which, as I say, was taken by Mike Cole and Jim Carter to start the scheme. I would also like to mention the then local chief superintendent, Peter Howse; the then chief constable, George Charlton, and the late Peter Ware, who was the editor of the Yarmouth Mercury at that time. Each of them had their own input and helped to make such a success of the new scheme.

It is only fair that we look at the humble beginnings of the scheme, which were in another country, where the idea first came about to encourage members of the public to give information on suspected criminals. The scheme started in Albuquerque, New Mexico, in 1976. A young man had been shot dead during a robbery at a filling station, and having made little headway in finding the perpetrator, police decided to set up an anonymous phone line for witnesses to come forward with information. Within 72 hours, arrests were made, but what amazed the New Mexico police was the number of people giving information on other, unrelated crimes. The Crimestoppers concept was born.

It was another six years before a youthful Detective Inspector Mike Cole was on a police visit to Peoria, in Illinois. He took a particular interest in the scheme that was being run by a sergeant in the community relations department. Working from a dedicated room, the sergeant was taking information from the public about crimes. The difference was that this information was given anonymously, and callers giving information that led to an arrest put themselves in line for a reward payment from money donated by local businesses. That was Crimestoppers Illinois-style.

Mike Cole was so impressed by the scheme and its results that, on his return to Great Yarmouth, he submitted a report daring to suggest that it be tried out in the town. Both his chief superintendent and the chief constable gave their approval. However, it was by chance that Jim Carter, the manager of the local Woolworths, who had been in that post for only about a year, received a letter from Chief Superintendent Peter Howse asking for support. The bottom line was that both Mike and Jim saw this scheme as an opportunity to get the community involved in crimefighting.

At this juncture, I want to take time out to pay tribute to another of my constituents, Carol Saldinack, who I am sure some people will have heard about from the media. She was the lady who reported her two sons to the police for their vicious attack on a father of two from Chichester. She reported them because she saw it as the right thing to do. Although she was not able to have anonymity—indeed, she did not want it—her action does give us hope that there are people who recognise that it is not the job of Government or the police alone to catch criminals; we all have a responsibility. I have met Carol and she wants to continue getting the message out about the need for all of us to take responsibility. If that means using Crimestoppers as a way of giving information anonymously, that should be encouraged.

Returning to the road that led to Crimestoppers, the next step was to convene a meeting of all the local businesses and, of course, the media in Great Yarmouth. Peter Ware, who was the editor of Yarmouth's local paper at the time, was on board from day one, giving the required space in the paper to fuel the Crimestoppers trial. The local business community willingly donated some cash and then £10 per month into the Crimestoppers account.

The scheme was officially launched on 24 June 1983 and the anonymous calls came in to a collator's office from 9 am until 5 pm, with an answer machine taking calls outside those hours. Once any information was received, the real police work began, with police gathering their own evidence, because anonymous information never could and never should be treated as evidence to be put before a court.

The scheme was a huge success and it had a positive effect on the crime figures. Other forces took a keen interest, and it was not long after officers from the Metropolitan police visited Great Yarmouth that the scheme went nationwide. Recalling the visit by the Metropolitan police officers, Mike Cole said:

"I was in the office one day when the switchboard said they had two superintendents from London in the front office. Their names were Harley and Street, so I thought it was a wind-up, but it was on the level."

Thus, the scheme began in what Jim Carter described as

"the sleepy backwater of a Norfolk seaside town."

Just four years later, Crimestoppers began to expand, with Thames Television adopting the idea and promoting it in the capital. Locally, the next huge step was the involvement of Anglia Television in promoting Crimestoppers throughout the Anglia region. The irony is that the then head of programming at Anglia, Jim Wilson, went on to become chairman of Norfolk police authority and of Anglia Crimestoppers.

From humble beginnings in Norfolk, Crimestoppers has spread to every part of the British isles. The essence of Crimestoppers has never changed. Mike Cole and Jim Carter feel very proud—quite rightly, in my opinion—to have been in at the start of one of the country's best crimefighting initiatives. They still recall those early days when the rewards were paid out under the town hall clock. I do not know whether they had to wear a red rose for identification, but I do know that this wonderful scheme is a huge success story. Great Yarmouth should be proud of having been in at the start.

Having looked at the scheme's humble beginnings in Great Yarmouth, I shall look at some of the successes of Crimestoppers nationally over the last 25 years, up to the present day. After its infancy in a single Great Yarmouth office, operating from 9 to 5, Crimestoppers now has 39 regional boards across the UK, Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. In its first year as a national venture, it received fewer than 5,000 calls; last year, it received more than 80,000 calls.

As well as its network of permanent staff, Crimestoppers has more than 400 people volunteering in their spare time to help to fight crime, and it is supported by a 24-hour call centre, ensuring that calls can be answered around the clock every day. With this supporting network, Crimestoppers has been no small success. Since the scheme went national in 1988, 84,000 arrests and charges have been made; nearly 1 million actionable calls have been received, and as a result, more than £100 million-worth of goods have been recovered and more than £145 million-worth of drugs have been seized. To put those impressive figures into context, some 17 people are arrested every day as a result of information given to Crimestoppers. In addition, every five days one person is charged with murder as a result of information given to Crimestoppers.

Following on from these impressive successes, Crimestoppers is now a leading player in a number of successful crime reduction partnerships. Teaming up with the Child Exploitation and Online Protection Centre, Crimestoppers has been a partner in "Most Wanted", an initiative that has been in place since November 2006, which helps to catch some of Britain's most dangerous criminals and missing convicted sex offenders. As part of the launch of "Most Wanted", five appeals for missing offenders were posted on the initiative's website. Within hours, as the result of the widespread publicity, Gordon Stewart, one of the five missing offenders, surrendered to the police. The website has received more than 8 million hits; more than 1 million appeals were viewed by the public when the campaign was launched, and to date nine offenders have been located.

Crimestoppers has also had success abroad, leading the campaign alongside the Serious Organised Crime Agency to catch British criminals in the Costa del Sol. Operation Captura in the Costa del Sol encourages anyone who recognises the wanted criminals on its website to call Crimestoppers from Spain, to give information anonymously on a dedicated Spanish free phone number, which is—

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. You can discuss Crimestoppers in Great Yarmouth and Crimestoppers in the UK—you can argue that Great Yarmouth is part of the UK—but when you start talking about Crimestoppers abroad, you are getting a little bit away from the subject matter of this debate.

Mr. Wright: Not really, Mr. Chope, because Crimestoppers UK receives the calls about the criminals who have escaped justice in the UK by going abroad, so it is very relevant to the scheme that started in Great Yarmouth 25 years ago, which encouraged people to contact the police. The scheme encourages people to report not just criminals in the UK but those who are abroad, so it has a direct relevance in that sense. I am nearly finished, Mr. Chope, so I will not take up much of your time on this particular subject, but I can assure you that it is all relevant to Crimestoppers UK.

[Mr. Anthony Wright]

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): My concern is that the title of the debate is Crimestoppers in Great Yarmouth. To extend it to Crimestoppers in the UK, which I have tolerated, is one thing, but to talk too much about the impact of Crimestoppers outside the UK is going a bit too far.

Mr. Wright: I crave your indulgence, Mr. Chope, as I turn to the multi-agency operation Pentameter 2, which launched last October to protect victims of the sex trafficking industry. Anonymous Crimestoppers intelligence has assisted the police in Leicestershire in rescuing six females from brothel premises, closing four brothels down and arresting two persons who were subsequently charged with running a brothel and controlling a prostitute. Through its youth arm, Shadow CS, Crimestoppers is now targeting the London boroughs that are hardest hit by gun and knife crime.

It is through collaborative partnerships and joint working between the police, businesses and the media that Crimestoppers has had the success that it has had, and will continue to have, I am sure, for the next 25 years and beyond.

Another element that is key to Crimestoppers having any success at all is the information provided to it by members of the public. Without people picking up the phone to make that call, the thousands of arrests and solved cases would not have been possible. So as we celebrate 25 years of successful crime stopping, we should also stop to recognise the individuals who come forward. Often that is not an easy thing to do. People may feel under pressure not to come forward because of the potential consequences; they may know the person who they are reporting. Crimestoppers teams and the general public must be congratulated on their efforts to bring criminals to justice. Those behind the scenes can look back with pride and highlight the fact that it all started in Great Yarmouth.

Crimestoppers has gone international. The fact is that without the two gentlemen who started the project, Jim Carter and Mick Cole, who are here today, the 80,000 or so arrests that have been made, not just in the UK but internationally, since Crimestoppers began would never have been made. I pay personal tribute to those two individuals from Great Yarmouth, to the community in Great Yarmouth for taking the initiative forward, and to successive Governments who have supported it.

Most of all, I encourage as many people as possible to use the anonymous phone lines and to listen to the words of Carol Saldinack, who is a constituent of mine. She did not have anonymity but she gave up her two sons because she thought that that was the right thing to do. She says that it is up to socially responsible people in society to use whatever measures are available, including Crimestoppers, to report criminal activity, wherever it takes place, so that we can help the police, and help the Government to bring down the crime statistics.

4.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Vernon Coaker): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope. I believe that it is the first time I have done so in my ministerial capacity. I wholeheartedly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) on securing another debate about his constituency. I know from a visit to his constituency that I made not too long ago how much he involves himself in the local community and how he does his best to work with all the local organisations and people not only to tackle crime but to deal with a great many other issues as well.

Crimestoppers UK, the national charity, celebrates its 20th anniversary this year, but, as my hon. Friend said, it all started in his constituency five years earlier, thanks to the innovation and public-spiritedness of two men. I pay tribute to them and thank them for what can only be described as pioneering work.

Visiting Peoria, Illinois, in 1982, Detective Inspector Mick Cole of Great Yarmouth police came across a scheme where a sergeant, sitting in a room on his own, took anonymous information from the public about crimes. When information led to an arrest, the callers put themselves in line for a reward from money donated by local businesses. Mick had the foresight to recognise the opportunity that that presented for policing in Great Yarmouth and, on his return, got his senior managers' backing for a trial in the town. Crimestoppers is a tribute to him. Many of us often see lots of good, exciting ideas and we think, "That is a good idea," but that is all we do about it. Great credit is due to him.

Jim Carter was managing the local Woolworths at the time. When he received a letter asking for support for the scheme, he thought it a brilliant idea, the sort of thing that businesses concerned about crime rates should support and a good way of getting the community involved in fighting crime.

From that pairing in Norfolk to the scheme's adoption by the Metropolitan police five years later to its roll-out across the country, from the receptiveness of the police to radically new ideas to wholehearted support from newspapers and television companies, Crimestoppers over the past quarter of a century has been a story of success. The 25th anniversary of Crimestoppers in Great Yarmouth and the 20th anniversary of its force-wide introduction in London provide us with an opportunity to reflect on that success, praise the results that have been achieved and thank the many volunteers, including many of our constituents, who have been involved in mounting campaigns and fundraising locally.

This year, Crimestoppers will receive its millionth actionable call. Since its inception, intelligence given anonymously by members of the public has led to more than 84,000 arrests and charges, the recovery of goods worth £101 million and the seizure of more than £148 million-worth of drugs. Seventeen people are arrested every day as a result of information given to Crimestoppers, and, as my hon. Friend said, one person is charged with murder every seven days. When people reflect that that was made possible by the imagination of two men 25 years ago in Great Yarmouth, they will realise that it a phenomenal achievement, and one to be justifiably proud of. Many people looking at today's agenda for our proceedings in Parliament will have looked at the title of this debate and wondered whether the subject was not a parochial one. But, when we reflect on it, we see that the impact of Crimestoppers in Great Yarmouth and in our country has been phenomenal. I hope that some of our hon. Friends take the opportunity to read some of the facts that we have laid out in this debate.

I pray for your indulgence for just half a minute, Mr. Chope, as I make my next point. Reaching abroad in support of SOCA last year, Crimestoppers UK's campaigning led to the capture of 11 fugitives believed to be on the run in Spain. Indeed, as my hon. Friend said, Crimestoppers works closely with the child exploitation and online protection unit to catch many missing convicted sex offenders on the Most Wanted website.

The results speak for themselves. The potential that Mick Cole and Jim Carter saw 25 years ago in Great Yarmouth has certainly been realised. I also point out that, as a consequence of that scheme, among other things, Great Yarmouth has had significant achievements recently on crime. The Great Yarmouth crime and disorder reduction partnership was set a target of reducing British crime survey comparator crime by 18.9 per cent, but by the end of March this year, it had achieved a 28.5 per cent. reduction. That equates to a reduction of 2,045 crimes against a target of 1,376. Crimestoppers will clearly have played a real part in that. Since 2003-04, theft from a motor vehicle has fallen by 69 per cent., domestic burglary is down 56 per cent., robbery is down 44 per cent. and theft of a motor vehicle is down by one third. Violent crime has also dropped significantly.

The strong performance on crime in my hon. Friend's constituency is reflected across Norfolk. Crimestoppers across Norfolk, including in Great Yarmouth, has clearly been of significant help in reducing the crime figures. Alongside that, there are now 114 more police officers in Norfolk than in March 1997 and some 230 community support officers.

However, real challenges remain to be faced. Not only must we continue to cut crime and make communities safer, but we need to secure the confidence of communities in doing so. Crimestoppers in Great Yarmouth and elsewhere is crucial to that. We are serving a public who, quite rightly, expect and deserve better information, improved accountability and timely and effective solutions across our public services.

In tackling crime, one of our greatest challenges is meeting the needs and expectations of the public, winning their confidence and bringing them in as part of the solution. Crimestoppers helps us do that. From its origins in Great Yarmouth, a network of 39 regional boards has grown across the UK, the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands. More than 400 people are now involved, donating their spare time to the fight against crime. The campaigns that they mount, using funds that they raise locally themselves, target messages directly to members of the public to inform them about particular incidents where the police need help or to raise the community's awareness of a more general issue.

It is incumbent on all of us to report crime that we witness or know something about, so that offenders may be brought to justice. By providing a mechanism to pass information to the police and others reliably but anonymously, Crimestoppers helps people in communities to fulfil this citizen duty, even where they are in difficult, vulnerable or dangerous circumstances. I pay tribute to those people—it would be remiss of us not to—who, through Crimestoppers or in other ways, try to support the police, often in difficult circumstances, to bring to justice offenders who are sometimes dangerous. As well as providing a means for people to report crime, Crimestoppers makes an important statement in every community in this country, effectively saying that we will do something about those who seek to undermine us and gain from their criminal behaviour.

As Mike Cole saw on his visit to Illinois 25 years ago, Crimestoppers enables information to come to light that the police would simply not be able to get through traditional routes. For that reason, the Crimestoppers Trust charity has received Government funding in recent years as a strategic partner in our work to reduce crime. This year, that money is part of £4 million provided by the Home Office to third sector partners involved in crime reduction, crime prevention and victim support work, with the Crimestoppers Trust being the largest recipient. Most recently, it has benefited from £50,000 to pilot a new service aimed at young people to allow them to contact Crimestoppers anonymously by sending an SMS text message—an innovative approach that is already showing results, just as an anonymous phone line in Great Yarmouth first did 25 years ago.

It is important to remember that Crimestoppers started in the communication age that existed 25 years ago and it was appropriate then. I hope that the example that I have just given demonstrates that Crimestoppers has to be an evolving concept, which remains true to its principles, but responds all the way along the line to the new communication age in which we live. Certainly, we should bear in mind the principle of people's being able to report crime anonymously and do their public duty in the way that Crimestoppers makes possible. We can now do that through SMS text messaging, and who knows where we go with this in future? The continuing development of Crimestoppers is important. As Mike Cole and Jim Carter reflect on that now, I wonder whether they would have thought 25 years ago that young people with mobile telephones would be able to report crime anonymously to the police through text messages. Sometimes, I wonder where we will be in 25 years with Crimestoppers and what the appropriate mechanism will be then.

Since 1997, the Government have been successful in bringing down crime. The excellent results seen in Great Yarmouth in the last few years are an example of what can be achieved when efforts are properly targeted. For the future, it is right that we focus on working in partnership and building public confidence, both of which are at the core of the Government's plans to reduce crime and increase community safety. They were also at the core of what Mick Cole and Jim Carter set out to achieve 25 years ago when they brought the idea of Crimestoppers back from Peoria and set it up in Great Yarmouth. They foresaw its potential for the town, but I wonder whether they could have imagined just how it would take off and expand, thanks to the hard work, generosity and commitment of numerous others.

As I said earlier, I am glad that we have had the opportunity in this debate to pay tribute to two men whose foresight has made each and every one of our communities safer. I am also pleased to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth for supporting that work and for introducing this debate today, the importance of which is not necessarily reflected in its short title. However, when people read the debate's content and see the impact that Crimestoppers has had in bringing people to justice and leading to arrests—not just for small crimes, important as those are, but for murders, too—they will reflect on the brilliance of Mike Cole and Jim Carter in having the imagination to pick an idea up, seeing its potential and, above that, having the confidence to drive it forward.

[Mr. Vernon Coaker]

I congratulate Mike Cole and Jim Carter and my hon. Friend. I hope that in 25 years, on the 50th anniversary of Crimestoppers, we shall reflect on a further 25 years of massive achievements and advancement.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 19 June 2008

[ANN WINTERTON in the Chair]

Deprivation/Child Poverty

[Relevant documents: Second Report from the Work and Pensions Committee, Session 2007-08, "The Best Start in Life? Alleviating Deprivation, Improving Social Mobility and Eradicating Child Poverty", HC42-I; and the Government response, HC 580.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Timms.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): I was rather hoping that the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Jenny Willott) would be here today, because she took part in the Committee's deliberations, but as she is now a Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesperson and dealing with the same subject, I understand why she is not present. Our congratulations go to her; she has been a valued member of the Committee since 2005.

We are here to discuss the Government response to the Select Committee's report. I might as well get the bad news out of the way first: the Committee found the response very disappointing. It was complacent, defensive and a restatement of existing policies, despite being published two days after the latest child poverty figures came out showing an increase of 100,000 children in poverty. Perhaps existing policy is not working. We need to put that on the record at the start.

I accept that there were significant announcements in last year's autumn performance report and the 2008 Budget, which we hope will take 650,000 to 700,000 children out of poverty. However, there is still enormous pressure to deliver on the 50 per cent. reduction target for 2010. No doubt the Committee will return to the subject and remain watchful and vigilant, as I am sure the Minister would expect it to be.

This debate is particularly relevant when we look not only at the less than 60 per cent. of average earnings definition of poverty but the material deprivation figures, especially given what is happening at the moment in food and fuel prices. That will obviously have a significant impact on material deprivation, although it might not have an impact on incomes. We need to recognise that it is an ongoing and serious issue for families on low incomes.

I shall talk first about the education aspects of our report. The Government have long recognised that we need to deal with generational inequalities, worklessness and similar problems. The key to breaking that cycle is getting today's poor children the best education possible.

It might be against the law, but it is a fact that many schools send letters home to parents saying that a school trip can go ahead only if contributions are received. The parents have the right to refuse to make a contribution, but if they do not make a contribution and the trip gets cancelled, word soon gets around about who has denied the rest of the class that opportunity. No matter how much that practice is against the law, it is happening. I have nine grandchildren, and they experience it week in, week out and month in, month out. It really is a problem. Children's education is incomplete when, because of poverty, they are unable to take advantage of those educational opportunities.

The practice extends further. Because things like music lessons are charged for in our schools, the vast majority of poor children are denied that opportunity because their parents cannot afford to pay. The cost is significant, but music lessons are part of that rounded educational experience that children should be getting, above and beyond the national curriculum.

Most poor children are self-excluded from extra-curricular activities, because they need to have games kit and equipment, such as cricket bats or whatever, and the family budget does not stretch to those items. The total educational experience is just not there for those children, and that leads to diminution in their happiness and performance at school, increased truancy and other effects. The child poverty unit is, as my right hon. Friend the Minister knows, the result of a partnership with the Department for Children, Schools and Families. This problem with extra-curricular activities is a key issue for it.

The other side of this problem is that, although we know that children in poor families have worse records of truancy, achievement and everything else, we have a benefits system that penalises their parents if they endeavour to take educational courses themselves. The 16-hour rule is far too rigid, stringent and perfidious and, as I say, it penalises parents who want to improve their life and better themselves through education. That is not a good message to send to children, is it?

Quite rightly, the state spends a fortune—billions of pounds—on supporting students into higher education. They then become higher earners and will, we hope, enhance and develop the economy, but those who are at the bottom of the pile get punished and penalised for taking educational courses. I know that there were some announcements in the Budget, particularly about lone parents, and I know that there are pilots running to help 16 and 17-year-olds who are not in education, employment or training. Generally speaking, however, the benefits system penalises those who try to improve their education and thus their employability.

I understand the argument that it is not the job of the welfare system to support students, but when people are trying to improve their employability and thus their ability to lift themselves and their family out of poverty—particularly when we are talking about courses in basic subjects such as maths and English—a degree of flexibility is needed in the rules and regulations. Perhaps that is an area that might be looked at further.

I would like to state some basic facts about child care. Only a third of those who are entitled to child care tax credit take it; that is an incredibly low take-up. Nationally, 22 per cent. of child care places are vacant. There are all sorts of problems, especially in London, with the cost of child care, including fees having to be paid up front, with some outfits even demanding a term's fees in advance. All of those costs militate against people getting child care.

Child care is crucial, not just for lone parents but for several other family structures. Having read the documentation, I think that the Treasury has really got a grip of this issue. Its review of child care tax credit and the work that it has published on that subject is spot-on. However, we need some rapid progress.

[Mr. Terry Rooney]

The Government's response is that it is the responsibility of a local authority to ensure that there is suitable and adequate child care provision in its area. However, when that provision is failing, it is the Government's responsibility to step in and deal with it. The Government simply cannot say to local authorities, "That is your responsibility and if you're not doing it right, get it sorted."

Last week, the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families announced that 658 secondary schools were not meeting their targets; they would get seven weeks to come up with an action plan, otherwise they would be taken over. Well, why do we not have the same focus and impetus when dealing with authorities that are failing to deliver adequate child care? The policy on child care is a national one—it is key to our strategy on cutting child poverty—and if local authorities are failing it is up to central Government to deal with that situation, and not to say that it is a problem that must be sorted out by others. Sadly, far too many authorities have been extremely complacent. Billions of pounds of Government money has gone into child care provision, but far too little regard has been paid to holding people to account for delivering what is necessary.

A further point is that although most people are adequately covered by child care provision between 8 am and 6 pm, lone parents in particular tend to work unsocial hours, evenings and weekends, and that is when child care is least likely to be available. The other big group facing difficulties is the parents of disabled children. Getting child care for a disabled child is inordinately expensive. Not only does the child care tax credit go nowhere near to covering the cost, but there is a paucity of supply. We know that the family of a disabled child is four times more likely to be in poverty, so we really need to do some serious analysis of how we can resolve that problem. The child care tax credit system will never work. More direct provision is required—a sort of drop-in facility, rather than parents having to go through all the rigmarole. I understand that a review is being done but that no commitments have been made.

Child care tax credit is limited to the first two children. There is no help at all if one has more than two children. Child care costs anything between £80 and £250 a week, depending on where one lives. If parents are getting a bit of cover for two children but have to pay for everything for two other children, moving into work is too uneconomic even to think about.

As I said, the Treasury is conducting a review, I hope in conjunction with the Department for Work and Pensions. I am encouraged by the scenario that it painted of the basis of the review. I hope that we will see some positive results from it, but it is obvious that child care has been a hindrance to moving into work for lone parents in particular, but for others as well. If that is the case—if it is such a key matter—we have to be big enough to say quickly that what we have been doing is wrong and that we will take the necessary action.

The Government's response on the "better off in work" calculation was, frankly, one of the most disappointing aspects of the document. A calculation should be just that. Jobcentre staff should be able to say to a claimant who is considering a prospective job what the difference in their income will be, after expenses—people should be able to see where they are now and where they would be if they were in work. To say, as the Government do, and as they reiterated in their response, that any incidental expenses connected with moving into work will not be taken into account in the calculation is, frankly, to be deceptive. A lone parent with three children immediately faces a bill of about £25 a week for school meals, where previously the children had free school meals. I accept the Government's argument that expenses related to moving into work are variable and that only standard expenses can be calculated, but the cost of school meals is standard, as are the costs of things such as prescriptions and everything else that one loses. For somebody who is on constant medication, that needs to be factored in. Transport costs, too, are constant.

It is insupportable to tell someone that they will be at least £25 a week better off in work when, in practice, they will be £30, £40 or £50 a week worse off. I repeat what we said in the report: that is a deception. Both sides of the equation must be put to people. Otherwise, they will lose confidence in the calculation. They will tell their friends, relatives, neighbours and other mothers at the school, and loss of confidence will rapidly decline into disbelief.

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is not just the end result of the calculation that is gravely flawed, but the fact that it can take up to half an hour to do it, even with the aid of an advanced piece of software and a benefits expert? By that time, any notion of an incentive to work is stone dead on the floor.

Mr. Rooney: I understand why some people waiting for the calculation to be completed lose the will to live. But, as always with such things, there is probably a simple solution that would be 70 per cent. wrong, or a longer solution that hopefully would be a bit nearer to being right. It is the components of the calculation that matter. The calculation has to give an exact and honest assessment of where people will be.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): Is there not an added factor? Is there not real risk of jobcentre staff saying that the person would be better off in work when in reality they would be worse off? Jobcentre staff are adopting a tighter sanctions regime, which might be based on their own thoughts about people being better off in work, even though that is not the reality.

Mr. Rooney: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks. I shall come on to sanctions in a moment, if he will permit me.

The Committee had the pleasure about 18 months ago of visiting Stratford jobcentre, which is very large. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister knows it well. A huge number of people go through it. We met a group of lone parents who had some horrifying stories to tell about their experiences. Most of them had not even been offered a "better off in work" calculation, and those who had and then had it checked somewhere else—by the citizens advice bureau and so on—found that it was far from accurate. That shattered their confidence in the system. They felt that they were being used, abused and misled, and that does not help anybody. It damages the reputation of Jobcentre Plus and the whole welfare to work programme, and it undermines credibility. That really needs to be reviewed.

As the Minister knows, a trial is being done in Yorkshire and Humberside, where my home is. I shall keep a close eye on it and report regularly and frequently about any discrepancies that I find.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): My hon. Friend is absolutely right that the passporting of benefits must be fully taken into account. At present, it is not taken into account when we look at in-work poverty. He may recall that in its current investigation of the role of carers, the Committee came across carers who work for 16 hours a week. Because of their caring responsibilities, they do not have the time to work more than that. As the national minimum wage has risen, they have had to reduce their hours in order to retain their carer's benefit. Is not that another example of how in-work poverty is not being tackled by the measures that the Government are contemplating?

Mr. Rooney: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There is a link between the minimum wage and the £95 a week disregard in carer's allowance. There is a similar problem with permitted working limits for incapacity benefit. If the two figures do not change at the same time, there can be a period when somebody suddenly finds that they are breaking the rules although they have done nothing wrong. There is an easy solution, and I hope that the Department is considering looking at it just once a year instead of at the point of change.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) mentioned sanctions. The Minister is well aware of my personal opposition—and, indeed, the Committee's opposition—to moving lone parents on to the jobseeker's allowance regime. I am grateful to him and accept that he has been extremely helpful, as has the Secretary of State, regarding how the regulations will be implemented. A great deal of flexibility will be allowed.

The decision has been made, so that is where we are, but there is still the problem of lone parents who get moved on to the JSA regime being exposed to a much harsher sanctions regime. It does not increase the child poverty numbers if somebody is sanctioned, as they are already in poverty. It just means that they are even deeper in poverty. I hope that the message is going out loud and clear that sanctions must be the last resort.

There is a general problem with sanctions. Too often, people do not know that they are being sanctioned; if they do know, they do not know why; and if they do not know why, they do not know how to put things right. The whole idea of sanctions is to change somebody's behaviour, but if communication is not clear, and if it is not apparent how behaviour can be corrected, the function of the sanction is lost. The research into the sanctions relating to the work-focused interview, which is a serious issue for lone parents, is due in about two weeks. It will be interesting to see what it has to say. I accept that there has to be a sanctions regime, but it has to work and it has to be understood by the claimant as well as the personal adviser or the decision maker.

By the bye, two large contractors who have pathways to work contracts have told me that they get a 40 per cent. no-show of referrals from Jobcentre Plus, but, although they send the names back for a sanction to be considered, nothing happens. One wonders whether these are just teething troubles in the early days, or whether people are saying, "We've got rid of that problem now; it belongs with the contractor so we don't need to do anything." Again, there is different treatment for different groups of clients.

I shall draw my remarks to a close, because I know that other hon. Members want to contribute to the debate. The key issue in relation to child poverty, identified by the Select Committee and by a number of other groups, is the point of change. People have to feel comfortable at the point of change. Too often, we are told that people on benefits are more comfortable with that much lower income—knowing that it is secure and will come every week, and most importantly knowing that the rent is paid and there is a guaranteed roof over their family's head—rather than with the haphazard world of work. A clear majority of lone parents are in work, so for some people it obviously works, but we do not do enough to find out what made it work for them and try to apply those lessons to the people who are left. Too often, we ask people, "Why aren't you pulling your finger out?" instead of trying to marry up the experiences of people who have successfully moved from benefits into work.

The fear that people experience is genuine and heartfelt. We talk a lot in the report about in-work poverty, but the fact is that if people move from benefits into work, their income increases significantly, albeit it might not lift them all the way out of poverty. If people are still nervous about taking that step, there is something wrong with the advice and guidance procedure beforehand. To help, we can be a lot more imaginative with benefit run-ons—there is a run-on on housing benefit, for example. The Work and Pensions Committee has published a report on research on social housing and worklessness in which we say:

> "The complex interaction between earnings, housing benefit, tax credits and resulting net income makes it difficult for tenants to fathom the financial consequences of entering work. Difficulties understanding this interaction and being able to compare net income in work compared to out of work were apparent among the people interviewed. Few respondents appeared to be aware of the operation of housing benefit as an in-work benefit, raising concerns about their ability to cover housing costs when in work.
>
> This uncertainty expressed by some respondents about the income implications of entering work was in stark contrast to the certainty of their current situation, which allowed the development of personal strategies for 'getting-by'. Many also drew attention to the insecure nature of the work available to them and contrasted this unfavourably with the stability of benefits"— despite their paucity. That encapsulates the problem.

Large groups of people are opting for the safety of very low income rather than taking a chance. That is especially true in London, because of the much higher rents there. Part of the problem is lack of knowledge and poor advice and guidance about in-work benefits; part of it is the appalling performance of some local authorities in processing housing benefit claims. The current one-month run-on should last for three months. Within that three months a local authority should have to establish the new claim and, if they do not do so, full run-on should carry on at the local authority's expense and the cost should not be reimbursed by the Exchequer. That would be a direct inducement to improve performance.

[Mr. Rooney]

We need to get over people's insecurity about the point of change. That applies equally to other issues. Housing benefit is the most spectacular example but there are others, such as entitlements to free school meals and school travel. For example, 57 per cent. of authorities still give clothing grants for school uniform, which people lose if they move into work. People take all those points into account in their minds: they are not stupid and they need to know that moving into work, which is supposedly so good for them, will actually work out.

Finally, I want to make two quick points about steps that we need to take to increase further the rate of progress on child poverty. At every Budget time, we see people almost scratching round to find £1 billion here or £1.5 billion there to try to at least hold the figures steady, so here are my proposals. First, if we enforced equal pay—it is nearly 40 years since the legislation came in—that would do an awful lot to reduce child poverty. Secondly, we have to grasp the nettle and increase the minimum wage by above the rate of inflation or the rate of wage increases. If we had a minimum wage of, say, £7 an hour today and enforced equal pay, we would take about 1.5 million children out of poverty straight away. Society and Government have a joint responsibility and an interest in this issue.

It is outrageous that, today, some 40 years after we passed equal pay legislation, 68,000 claims are pending at an industrial tribunal. In local government alone, some 400,000 claims of a class action nature are waiting; there are others across the public sector and many more in the private sector. Forty years on, we really should be saying, "Enough is enough; everybody's had a chance," and enforcing the legislation.

The two measures that I have mentioned would have a dramatic effect on the child poverty figures. At the end of the day, that is what matters. We are talking about children. Putting it crudely, these are the people who will be paying their national insurance contributions that fund our pensions in retirement and paying for our care in residential homes, or wherever, and they deserve a better chance than they have at the moment.

2.57 pm

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): I congratulate the Chairman of the Committee on securing this well-timed debate, coming as it does shortly after the news that the number of children living in poverty has risen by 100,000 for the second year running. That stark statistic led the End Child Poverty campaign to say that such a poor result will be a setback to the Government's target of halving the number of children living in poverty by 2010. The Committee Chairman has presented a pretty thorough, comprehensive survey of many of the points contained in the Committee's report and, I am sad to say, summarised accurately the Committee's reaction to the Government's response, which we had hoped would be substantially more constructive and engaged than it was. I hope that the Minister will be able to embroider and develop the Government's response and, perhaps, change that perception by the end of this debate.

This problem affects all of us. I am pretty sure that every hon. Member present has pockets of poverty and deprivation in their constituencies, no matter which part of the country they represent. In my constituency of Weston-super-Mare, according to figures released by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation; 19 per cent. of children live in families on out-of-work benefits. That local authority is one of the dozen or so worst in the south-west. In fact, we have seven super-output areas in the bottom 10 per cent. of indices of multiple deprivation, and two super-output areas in the middle of Weston-super-Mare in the bottom 2 per cent. of indices of multiple deprivation. Therefore, the issue affects all hon. Members here today, who will have pockets of severe poverty in their constituencies as well as less badly affected areas.

I want to discuss what we mean by poverty. One of our early recommendations as a Committee was that the Government should change the way in which they measure and report poverty. That might sound like a slightly dry topic, but it has fundamental and profound implications, because poverty, as we all know, is a multifaceted problem: many different factors contribute to it and affect it. Therefore, the Government could pull many different levers to try to improve the situation.

The Government have moved towards viewing poverty through three simultaneous lenses. They use a relative measure, the internationally comparable OECD measure of 60 per cent. of median income, to assess poverty. Whenever we made international comparisons in our report, the Committee used that index as a way of comparing the UK's performance with that of others.

In addition to the relative measure, the Government use material deprivation, which is very closely linked with the indices of multiple deprivation that I was just discussing. Under that measure, it is a question not just of how much money is coming into a household—the income relative to the national median—but what someone can buy with that money. The Chairman of the Committee rightly pointed out that in London, where living costs are high, a person can have the same income as someone who lives in another part of the country, in which the cost of living is lower, and yet be able to afford fewer of the essentials of life and, therefore, be comparatively worse off. That is a particularly important issue given the environment in which we live at the moment, with rising fuel and food prices. Many of the essentials of life are becoming rapidly more expensive. Therefore, material deprivation will become more of an issue. It is appropriate for the Government to consider poverty through that lens as well.

The final measure that the Government use relates to social mobility and the persistence of poverty. Again, that is a crucial measure. It is question not just of whether someone's income briefly falls below 60 per cent. of the median, but how long it stays there. If people are temporarily out of work—even if it is only for a week or two—their income could theoretically fall below 60 per cent. of the median. As such people may only be out of work for a week or two before getting another decently paid job, that should not push Government policy in a particular direction. We must address the problem of those who find themselves stuck in poverty for an appreciable length of time because obstacles prevent them from getting out of it.

The Chairman of the Committee made some important points about people who are affected by change and who find it, if not comfortable, comforting to remain in a situation that is stable and safe rather than take the risk of going into work. They may worry about how all the unknowns, which have overcomplicated the benefit system with multiple interactions, will impact on their situation if they take that risk.

It is appropriate for the Government to look at poverty through those three different lenses. It is vital as well because this is not just an academic debate about the causes of poverty. Were we to choose only one of those views of poverty, it would have profound implications on the policies that we pursue to relieve poverty.

For example, were we to choose the relative measure of poverty and say that it is important to minimise the number of people who are below 60 per cent. of the median income, it would unavoidably push us in the direction taken by the Scandinavians to relieve poverty. We would have to have significant rises in taxes to effect substantial rises in benefits, particularly out-of-work benefits and possibly the minimum wage as well. The Government have not gone down that road. It is not Government policy solely to use that method of alleviating poverty, and my party would probably agree with them on that. There are other things that we need to do. With the possible exception of the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen), who might think that the perfect solution to relieving poverty, there is not a widespread political consensus that that is the only road out of poverty, even though it works for other societies such as those in Scandinavia.

Therefore, it is vital for the Government to be clear about what they are trying to do to alleviate poverty. If they are to hit their target in 2020 of substantially wiping out child poverty—even if as gently and elegantly as they can they are backing away from the notion that they will hit their halfway-point target in 2010—it is essential that we all understand what the Government aim to do. Many of the essential planks in their platform will take effect not between now and 2010 but from 2010 to 2020—in particular, the welfare-to-work reforms.

Those reforms are critical because the Government are effectively saying that they will not rely purely on a Scandinavian attempt to raise taxes and benefits, but on getting more people back into work and off benefits, allowing them to take the step through the point of difference—to which the Chairman of the Committee referred—believing that they will be better off in work. We hope that the "better off in work" calculation will be simple, easy to understand and right. A combination of earnings and in-work benefits, or tax credits, is the way to lift people either out of severe poverty and improve their earnings or to lift them entirely out of poverty over time. I hope that that is a statement of where the Government are going.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Would the hon. Gentleman couch that in terms of the broad philosophy that David Freud has brought to Government policy in the Department for Work and Pensions and other Departments? He says that so many of our interventions to get people out of long-term sickness, disability and unemployment are very short-term—they last 12 weeks and then there is the revolving door and so on. Does the hon. Gentleman think that one of the answers is more concentrated help over a longer period, and not being fussy about who the agents are to supply that change?

John Penrose: I agree with large parts of the Freud report. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that Freud recommends introducing far more variety of supply into the welfare-to-work arena so that more organisations, particular those in the third and charitable sectors, can get involved in getting people in hard-to-reach groups back to work. Also, we must ensure that organisations are paid by results over an extended period. It is not enough to give someone a couple of brief courses, get them into a job and then wash our hands of them. We must ensure that the job is sustainable and that the person remains in work for an appreciable period. In a previous report, the Committee recommended that the person should be in work for at least a year before the welfare-to-work agency receives full payment. That would help to ensure that the problems mentioned by the hon. Gentleman are avoided.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): My hon. Friend made the point earlier that the "better off in work" calculation should be simple. Should it not be as simple as possible? Almost from the first step, when getting on or off benefits, it should be a question of one, two or three presses of a button to do the calculation. If we can make the process really simple—almost from the first calculation that is done—it would encourage people to say with confidence, "I would be better off in work and off benefits."

John Penrose: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. Two things would need to happen for that to be achieved. An incredibly complicated piece of software must be updated in enormous and excruciating detail every time there is a benefits change to simplify the calculation. However, we can only go so far in improving that software to try to reduce the number of keystrokes in the way he describes. The fundamental problem is trying to model the effects of an appallingly complicated benefits system with multiple interactions and interdependencies. In an earlier report, one of the Committee's conclusions was that only a limited amount can be done by improving the software. We will need to simplify dramatically the benefits system and its interaction with tax credits before we will make much headway. It is fundamental, but that is the way that we need to head.

May I finish off this point about the Government's overall approach to poverty by pressing the Minister on a particular question? As I understand it, the Government have committed themselves to three ways of viewing poverty and have, therefore, committed themselves to the policy outcomes and approach that I have just been describing. As I mentioned, one of those ways of assessing poverty is the internationally comparable OECD measure of 60 per cent. of median income. I had thought that that measure was part of the Government's approach; indeed, it appears throughout our report, and every time we made an international comparison, that was the measure that we used. However, in a recent debate about poverty—it was about pensioner poverty, but child poverty and pensioner poverty clearly share a common definition of poverty—two of the Minister's departmental colleagues sought to rubbish that measure of poverty. They said that the calculations by EUROSTAT, which seeks to make international comparisons, are somehow not to be believed.

I appreciate that the Minister's colleagues were probably seeking to avoid embarrassment on the Floor of the House because they were being accused at the time of having engineered a situation in which Britain's pensioners were worse off than those anywhere else in the EU, apart from Latvia, Cyprus and Spain. However, the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt), said:

[John Penrose]

"The EUROSTAT survey measures the median income of each country and that of pensioners. The UK is relatively well-off so our poverty line is higher, and so our "poorest pensioners" are better off than the "poorest pensioners" in other countries. The motion's claim is therefore spurious." [Official Report, 4 June 2008; Vol. 476, c. 880.]

In the same debate, the Minister for Pensions Reform said:

"Because we are a wealthier country, our poverty level in the EUROSTAT statistics is set higher than that for most European countries. That is the way the EUROSTAT statistics are set...Our pensioners are therefore much better off than those in most other countries." [Official Report, 4 June 2008; Vol. 476, c. 8[illegible]]

I hope that the Minister will clarify the situation. The whole point of the measure using 60 per cent. of median income, which the Government and his Department have used until now, is that it is internationally comparable. It allows international comparisons to be made and conclusions to be drawn in the way that the Committee has just done in its report. It is therefore a little awkward, to put it politely, for the Government to want to have their cake and eat it by using those international comparisons when they show the Government's record in a flattering light, but back-pedalling rapidly when they come up with conclusions that Ministers do not like. Perhaps the Minister could therefore make it clear that the Government remain committed to that measure of poverty as one of the three that they use and that his colleagues were perhaps paddling rather furiously to avoid embarrassment on the Floor of the House, rather than necessarily being bang on in their representation of Government policy at the time.

The Chairman of the Committee has covered the points made in the report in fairly comprehensive detail, so I shall focus on just one additional issue – child care. Child care is clearly one of the most important obstacles to taking parents and their children out of poverty. Although the Government have managed to engineer a substantial increase in the number of child care places over the past few years, that increase has come at a cost. There is not just the financial cost, although the Government have clearly come up with extra money to finance child care places. In increasing the number of places, however, they have also dramatically increased the amount of regulation, red tape and bureaucracy, as well as the expectations, surrounding child care places.

There are sometimes excellent reasons for the changes. Some have happened because of child protection issues and because we have needed to ensure that Criminal Records Bureau checks on child care providers are done correctly. In other cases, the concern has been to improve the quality of child care, and that has led to regulations governing child care providers' minimum qualifications and the minimum ratios of child care providers to children. As a result of such provisions, however, the number and range of child care providers has been dramatically reduced as fewer organisations have been able to provide the care envisioned in the Government's guidelines, which have become substantially tougher and more serious. The cost of child care has also grown dramatically, and one direct result of that, which we can all see, is that child-minding provision has declined dramatically.

As the Chairman of the Committee said, we have therefore ended up not only with an increase in the number of child care places, but with a dramatic increase in the number of vacancies and unused places, which now account for about 22 per cent. of places up and down the country. I suspect, as do many others, that that means that we have a monolithic, bureaucratic, over-engineered set of providers providing what the Government have defined as the right kind of care, which will, however, almost inevitably not match what parents want and need.

Mr. Sheerman: The Select Committee on Children, Schools and Families has just returned from two intensive days' work in Copenhagen. What the hon. Gentleman says strikes a particularly discordant note for someone who has just come back from a country that supplies very high-quality early-years care. Does he not agree that if we are to stimulate young children as early as we can, it is the quality of the setting that matters? He would surely agree that part of what the Government are trying to do is to squeeze out below-standard child care. I, too, would like to have my cake and eat it and to have low-cost, stimulating, high-quality care. At this point in the 21st century, however, society can surely no longer accept the fact that poor children go into environments where they are not well stimulated because the pay and training of those who work there is poor.

Ann Winterton (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the hon. Gentleman to respond, let me say that interventions should be somewhat briefer. I allowed the previous one to end naturally, but I trust that hon. Members will bear in mind what I have said.

John Penrose: I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman's point about the importance of quality. The point that I am trying to make is that although the regulations that the Government have introduced in an effort to achieve their laudable aim have improved quality in some respects—I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber would sign up to that aim—they might also accidentally be squeezing out some potentially high-quality providers. I have no problem with squeezing out poor-quality provision—that is absolutely fine—but highly regulated, bureaucratically defined provision can often lead to other, unusual, different kinds of high-quality provision being excluded too. I suspect that that is one of the problems that we are seeing at the moment, which is why we have a mismatch between what parents want and what is being provided, and that has resulted in a large number of underused and vacant places in the existing child care sector.

I was therefore concerned by the Government's response, which did not seem to address the issue or suggest that any material change was in the wind. Clearly, there must be some way of providing a high-quality but far more flexible set of services at an affordable cost or at a different time of day, a different day of the week or a different month of the year. In that way, people who do not want to work from 9 to 5, but at other times of the day, or those who want to continue their jobs during school holidays, would not have to give up their jobs when the existing level of provision caused them child care problems.

I was filled with gloom when I read the Government response. Yesterday, however, the clouds parted, and I saw a ray of sunshine. Two of the Minister's colleagues came to give oral evidence to the Committee on the issue of care. That was part of an inquiry into social care, but there are clear parallels and overlaps with the causes of child poverty, as I am sure that the Minister will understand. The difference between the Government's approach to social care and what they said in response to the Committee's report was stark.

Yesterday, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), who has responsibility for care services, said that the Government were trying to move towards a system of personal budgets and personal accounts, giving people control over the money that is spent and allowing them to choose who provides their care services. He said that the Government were looking at three different models. In one, people would employ their own staff and run their own operation. In the second, they would get the money and pay a traditional care provider to provide a service. In the third, the person would want the maximum ability to articulate their own needs and would want the authorities to settle the bills because they would not want the hassle of the bureaucracy. He then went on to tell the Committee that "it is not just about choosing from the existing menu. The whole point of giving people personal budgets is to change the provider side. It is to change the menu, not to choose from traditional conventional services. If we are going to create a flexible system, it is not just about giving people power and control, it is also making sure that the provider side, the supply side, is completely different and people can use that money in an innovative and imaginative way."

The Under-Secretary then got the wind in his sails and a couple of pages later started to get very enthusiastic. He said that "it is about completely reorganising the relationship between the State and the citizen. It is a massive redistribution of power, frankly, from the State to the citizen without leaving the citizen alone."

He finished by saying that "I think probably personal budgets in the hands of lead professionals, right and responsibility contracts, ruthlessly identifying which families we are talking about would be a major way of tackling child poverty and breaking into generational deprivation, stopping kids drifting into the criminal justice system, supporting good parenting. It has the potential to transform."

That was eye-opening, fresh and new and I thought that it was a potential answer to a great many of the criticisms and concerns outlined in our report. The contrast between what he had to say and the Government's response to the report was very stark, so I hope that the Minister will explain to us either that the Department is examining that approach, to see how it can be applied to child poverty more generally, and particularly to child care issues, or, if it is not, why not. One of the answers I have recounted seems a great one; the other one, as encapsulated in the Government's reply to the report, does not.

3.21 pm

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose). I cannot say that the earth moved while he was speaking; it was just my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound) moving the furniture around. Nevertheless, he made a valuable contribution to the debate, and he made a valuable contribution to the Committee's work and its report.

The report is called "The best start in life?" and that question mark says a lot about whether we are giving such a start to children. That is the aspiration, of course. The subtitle is "Alleviating deprivation, improving social mobility and eradicating child poverty". It is a very good report, and it has been acclaimed by many organisations. One of them, the Child Poverty Action Group—I shall quote it again later—said it was "a comprehensive analysis of many of the issues facing poor children and families."

I am proud to have helped, as a member of the Committee, to produce the report. I pay tribute to the Select Committee Chairman on steering the report through, notwithstanding that he turned down several of my radical suggestions, which would have improved it still further. Nevertheless, he did an excellent job.

As I am paying tributes, I shall start my speech with one of the first conclusions of the Committee, which was praise to the Government. The report states:

"Significant progress has been made in tackling child poverty. In 1998-99 the UK had the worst record on child poverty of any major European nation; there were 3.4 million children living in poverty and child poverty had more than doubled over the previous two decades. Since then this rising trend has been reversed and there are now 600,000 fewer children living in poverty."

In their response the Government pointed out, with reference to their Budget measures and the comprehensive spending review, how those new measures should lift another 500,000 out of poverty. However, there is a gap, and the Child Poverty Action Group spells it out in statistics in its briefing for this debate. It says that what the Government are doing will "still leave a major gap to meet the 2010/11 target."

It continues:

"In 1998/99 the Government's central measure (relative incomes before housing costs) counted 3.4 million children as poor. If the government's target to halve child poverty is to be met poverty needs to fall to no more than 1.7 million children. In 2006/07 on this measure poverty stood at 2.9 million children, leaving a 'gap' to the target of 1.2 million children. Taking account of recent announcements which have not yet fed into the figures the unmet gap between the projected poverty level and meeting the target is around 650,000 children."

That is a sizeable gap still to be covered. On top of that we must consider the impact of higher inflation—the food, fuel and energy prices that could also put the Government off track in getting the figure down.

I know that the Chairman summarised the report, but I want to go through the key points. It said that it is only through further investment that the Government can meet their target of halving the number of children living in poverty by 2010. That is crucial; notwithstanding what is happening in the Budget and the comprehensive spending review. Further investment is still needed if we are to get there. The report also says that the Government must accelerate their efforts if the targets are to be met. It talks about the Government missing the target by which is not out of line with what the CPAG says, because of recent figures showing a rise of 100,000. The figure could be 1.5 million children after taking housing costs into account. We know from the Government's response that they will not take them into account in relation to their targets, but it is worth recalling those extra 500,000 children. It is a question of reality. Families do not live on income before housing costs are taken into account; they live on income after taking into account housing costs.

[Harry Cohen]

"close to a million children",

The Committee went on to talk about evidence of the damaging effect of poverty on children. They are more likely to experience social exclusion and poor educational outcomes. The groups of children who faced a much higher risk of living in poverty were those from families in which there was disability, those with lone parents, some from ethnic minority families, and those from London, which has some of the worst child poverty.

The Committee congratulated the Sure Start local programmes, and I pay tribute to the Government for those—some excellent work has been done on health education and financial advice for parents. However, it also raised the issue of the need for good quality child care—particularly for lone parents, if we are to get them back to work. The Committee agreed that that is an ideal for which we should be working. However, it identified a mismatch between the child care that is available and what parents need—provision that is affordable as well as being available during the hours that they work. Again, the availability of child care is a particular problem in deprived areas of London, where the mismatch is stark. As to part-time jobs and flexible working, many other workers are available to take those jobs, so there is a shortage of them for lone parents.

The Child Care Act 2006 places a duty on local authorities to ensure a sufficiency of child care in their areas. The Committee welcomed that, but said that it needed to be monitored. However, the Government said in their response that they had no plans to do so; they will not collate and publish local authorities' assessments of child care in their area. Those will be published only by the local authorities in question. I wonder how that duty will be effectively implemented on that basis.

The Committee argued that if employment is to be sustainable, parents must be financially better off in work than they are on benefits, which suggests improvements to in-work benefits. There is a need, as has been said, for higher wages to close the gender gap and in London where costs are higher. The Committee also argued, in that context, that even if the Government were to achieve their 80 per cent. employment rate, many children would still live in workless households where the pay is insufficient to lift the whole family out of poverty. There must be an anti-poverty strategy to deal with that.

The Committee also argued that there is a case for higher benefit uprating for targeted groups such as those with children who are unable to work, through no fault of their own, because of a disability; child benefit and tax benefits could also be raised to try to achieve the child poverty reduction targets.

One important recommendation that I made, which was included in the report, is that all major new Government tax-and-spend policies should be accompanied by a report to Parliament explaining their impact on child poverty. We do that for human rights, and if child poverty is the major priority, as the Government have said—I agree that it should be—we should have such assessments. That would stop the Government being waylaid, sometimes by the Opposition, and taxing and spending on something that will have no impact on that key target, and may work against the provision of resources for this key target. I support that recommendation that the Chairman allowed me to squeeze into the report.

I want to draw attention to the Child Poverty Action Group's response, which said that the Government's "response was disappointing in largely restating existing policy positions, this was made worse given the response was published a mere two days after the latest figures showed that child poverty continued to rise in 2006/07. Child poverty rose in 2006/07 because the government took its foot off the accelerator, with that in mind we are looking to government for a much more vigorous response to the challenges faced today.

This government response, frequently complacent and defensive, looks markedly different from welcome investments in children in Budget 2008, the Ending Child Poverty everybody's business' document, published with the budget, and from recent joint oral evidence given by Ministers from the Departments for Work and Pensions, Children, Schools and Families and HM Treasury on the 9th June. At this stage of policy, approaching the 2010 target and with meeting this interim target a vital base for moving towards the eradication ambition CPAG is looking for more enthusiasm, energy and investment around what has been perhaps the key recent change making pledge."

I agree that we want energy and investment from the Minister, not the Government's bland and unsatisfactory response.

I shall go into some aspects of the Government's response with which I am not satisfied. I mentioned the local authority child care duty not being monitored or effective. If it were effective, it would have an enormous impact on child poverty, so I am dismayed that it will be put on the back burner. I also referred to the decision not to consider income after housing costs. I know that the Government are struggling to achieve their target, but housing costs are a reality for families and affect 500,000 people. I shall say more about that in a moment, but perhaps there is scope to pick that up in the review of housing benefit.

The Select Committee recommended that the higher child care tax credit for families with a disabled child should be raised to £300 a month. In their response, the Government said that there is a disabled child element of £2,540, but if the monthly amount were raised to £300, the annual amount would be £3,600. In their response, the Government said that the disabled child element is £2,540 per annum, with an additional severely disabled element of £1,020. The Committee recommended, and I believe, that there should be uprating of about £1,000, which would impact enormously when there is poverty in families with disabled children.

The Government's response on disabled living allowance was surprising. They said that it is not designed to cover the extra costs of disability, but went on to say that it is a broad-brush contribution towards a generality of extra costs faced by disabled people. That is an almost meaningless distinction, and I would like the Minister to explain it. The Government go on to say that no work is planned.

The DLA was informed by surveys on disability during the 1980s. We are now more than 20 years on from that, and today's evidence should be considered. It would show that there are extra costs, and the Committee alludes to extra costs causing child poverty in families with disabled children. The Government rejected the Committee's recommendation that winter fuel payments should be extended to families with a disabled child under five and in receipt of DLA at the middle or higher rate. That is disappointing.

On child care in London, especially for lone parents, the Select Committee expressed concern about the difficulties of finding work with suitable and flexible hours and conditions, and the effect of sanctions on children. The Chairman made that point, and the Government's response was that the sanctions on jobseeker's allowance would be flexible. We wait to see what that means, but the indications are that they are increasing considerably, including for lone parents. The response says that parents will not be sanctioned if child care is not available, but it will be up to the parents to prove it. How will that work? Will the Minister explain? There are clear cases in London of that mismatch where child care is not available. How will parents provide proof in such circumstances?

On child care and the local authority's role, the Government have said that there is enough money in the system already, and that in deprived areas it may be preferable to ensure that providers have a realistic business plan instead of making financial payments to providers. How will that help a London lone parent to have the child care that she needs to work and to avoid sanctions when the duty on local authorities will not be monitored or enforced? What exactly does "realistic business plan" mean in that context and to the individual concerned?

Another area that I was keen to promote in the report was the London living wage, which the former Mayor of London adopted for the Greater London authority. The Government's response was that although DWP works with contractors, it does so on staff conditions, including the minimum wage, but there was no mention of the London living wage. That is a serious omission by the Government, who should support the London living wage. The extra costs of working in London are considerable, and they contribute to the problem of child poverty and whether parents are better off in work or not. The Government should face up to that. The CPAG said:

> "For a very large government department, responsible for the child poverty target, CPAG would like to see clearer and stronger leadership. It is a scandal that half of all poor children have a parent in work. Government can and should lead by example, not just in London but across the UK."

That makes the point about in-work poverty.

The Government accept that the gender pay gap contributes to child poverty. They are seeking belatedly to close it, and it is a public service agreement target. But how will that work, and what effective measures will they provide and at what speed will they move to close the gender pay gap? There was no response from the Government to the Committee's recommendation for research into the problem. Again, that was a disappointment.

Another response from the Government referred to the DWP's position in relation to disabled children. The Government said that parents who are not eligible for carer's allowance have children who by definition do not require a level of care that would prevent them from working. That would have a potentially pernicious effect if it were adopted as a rigid policy by the jobseeker's allowance staff because other factors can prevent a lone parent with a disabled child from working—for example, the lack of child care that I have mentioned. That response does not reflect the reality for families with disabled children. The Committee argued that a broader definition is needed to exempt those people from the requirement to work and that the Government need seriously to consider whether a wider group should be exempted. Otherwise, sanctions would be unfair and unreasonable and would reinforce poverty, not alleviate it.

I shall now refer to the representations we had from Treehouse, which is the national charity for autism in education. It has stated that > "Children with autism are disproportionately represented in those being excluded from schools; 27% of children with autism have been excluded from school".

It went on to say:

> "The impact of disability on poverty is clear, the figures speak for themselves: 3% of mothers of a disabled child being in full-time employment as compared to 22% of mothers of a non-disabled child. 84% of mothers of disabled children do not work, as compared to 39% of mothers with a non-disabled child. It costs, on average, three times as much to raise a child with a complex impairment than a non-disabled child. Over a quarter of parents with a disabled child are lone parents."

Treehouse agrees with the Committee's report, particularly those aspects pertaining to disabled children. In addition, it recommends improvements to support services, more inclusive schooling, greater flexibility in the workplace, and better access to services to ensure traditionally deprived and hard-to-reach groups are well-informed about them and that they are able to access them.

The main representations we had were from the Child Poverty Action Group. It said:

> "it is essential that the Government invests a further £3billion in child tax credit and child benefit to meet the 2010 target...This is affordable and the cost of not meeting the target will be far greater in the long term."

The CPAG also drew attention to schools and the school costs referred to by the Chairman in his opening remarks. It said:

> "Though CPAG accepts there are legal limits around what schools can charge for, it is still our experience that the costs of uniforms, trips, requests for contributions, and the costs of meals do cause families hardship, single some children out for bullying and may cause them to miss out on opportunities, both in the school day and within the wider 'extended' school period."

It also said that

> "The Government makes the extraordinary statement that 'it is not aware of evidence showing that the cost of school uniform is a major barrier to poor families' or that 'it is common for schools to provide free school meals in a stigmatising way'. These answers strike us as complacent and blinkered in their approach to educational exclusion."

The CPAG goes on to refer to the report of the schools costs coalition and the citizens advice bureau, "Adding Up", which includes a survey that found that one in five parents of primary school children and 50 per cent. of parents of secondary school children reported spending more than £200 a year on uniform and PE kit. The same report points out that in 2007, 57 per cent. of English and Welsh authorities did not provide uniform grants. School costs do have a kick-in effect on the poorest and their families. Indeed, the campaign that the CPAG is running is called "2 skint 4 school".

[Harry Cohen]

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): My hon. Friend referred to the stigma attached to having free school meals. I am very much aware of that problem. The other day, I visited a school in my constituency that is one of the brand new schools built under the Building Schools for the Future programme. Children at the school are given smartcards—a bit like Oyster cards—that they can charge up with cash. The cards mean that children are not aware of whether somebody is having free school meals and has been given a card that has already had money put on it, or whether they have added the money themselves. There is therefore no way of telling whether someone is on free school meals when they pay. Is that something that has come to the Committee's attention and does it think that should be adopted more widely?

Harry Cohen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning that example. The Government should be pressing schools to adopt such ideas, and they should have been doing so a while ago. The Government cannot say that there is no stigma to free school meals when the CPAG has pointed out that some schools run separate queues. If such techniques are available, the Government should accept that they have a role to play in dealing with that problem.

The CPAG also talked about the Government's response in relation to Gypsy and Traveller families. The Government argue that Gypsy and Traveller families are a small group and that Office for National Statistics definitions do not allow separate measurement for that group. That answer is weak. Even if population surveys do not provide the evidence, the DWP could conduct specific research among that group to explore child outcomes. The group is known to face high levels of poverty and barriers to using services, therefore such research must be a priority. The Government should not be so complacent. It is a relatively small group, but a little action could have a major positive affect on those involved. Will the Minister look at that matter again?

On large families, the CPAG and other organisations have long argued for the second and subsequent child on child benefit to be on the same rate as the first child. Although that was not accepted by the Committee, I certainly support that measure as it would have an impact on child poverty and is a simple way of dealing with child poverty in large families.

Job retention is important in relation to in-work benefit—not just because people are better off in work and are out of child poverty when they are working, but because it means that people can stay in a job, particularly lone parents. The Government need to put more emphasis on in-work benefits to assist with job retention.

As I said, a review was announced in the last Budget on housing benefit. Will the Minister give more details of the scope and progress of the review—not in this debate, but at some point soon? As far as I am aware, those details have not yet been placed in the public domain. Will the Minister ensure that the review has a specific mandate to consider reform of housing benefit for the best impact on child poverty?

On benefits uprating generally, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation recently published a report stating that the gap is widening for those who have to rely on benefit because benefits are not properly inflation-proof. The CPAG says that "the lack of budget standards analysis to inform benefit rates or of a consistent approach to ensure rates keep track with changing social norms is indefensible if the safety net is intended to meet basic need and prevent poverty. The year on year degradation of benefits relative to typical wealth is part of the UK's damaging culture of inequality that must be ended."

Again, I agree. The Select Committee argued that there was a case for targeted increases in benefits, particularly in the area of disability, to which I have referred.

Poverty is, as we have said, damaging, but prices are going up for food, fuel and energy and that must be taken into account in meeting the child poverty targets. That means that the Government have to put their foot back on the accelerator and do more than they have been planning to do. I do not want to go through in detail the debacle of the abolition of the 10p tax rate; we all know what happened. I understand that it affected 5.3 million people. I am told that the Government's uprating of the tax allowance benefited some 17 million people net. Some of those—not all—will be dealing with child poverty. My concern is that that measure is for one year only—it is not recurrent—so come this time next year, those people, particularly the poorer groupings, will be plunged back into crisis. I want to use the opportunity offered by this debate to urge the Government to think again on that issue, particularly for the lower-paid, painful though that may be.

Then there is the credit crunch and the risk of recession. There is the issue of stagflation as well. That could have impacts on the employment market. I am not saying that that would necessarily mean higher unemployment. The Government have done very well to buck trends and keep unemployment coming down, but there could be an impact. If that happens, the policy of pushing people into employment and getting children out of poverty will need to be rethought. If the credit crunch had such an impact, there might be areas, such as London, where that would need to be mitigated.

I reiterate that there is a need for higher in-work pay and benefits. The American model of being in work and in poverty is unacceptable. The Government should make it a priority to ensure that that does not happen in this country. There need to be in-work benefits. Also important are the London living wage, a higher minimum wage and closing the gender pay gap. Those are my main points. I reiterate the case that I made in the Select Committee that tax-and-spend measures are a major issue. The Government should submit a report to Parliament on their impact on child poverty. That in itself would have a good effect.

3.53 pm

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): I start by congratulating the Select Committee on producing the report. Although child poverty may be fairly easy to describe in headline terms, the devil is in the detail, and the report gives a comprehensive overview of the different factors that have an impact on child poverty and the various measures that need to be taken to tackle it. Quite often, something looks in theory as though it would alleviate a particular family's poverty, and it is only when we get down to the detail and start making those complex calculations that we realise how it works in practice. It is therefore important that the Committee is giving the matter a great deal of scrutiny and responding to it in such detail.

Such a timely report can help to keep child poverty on the political agenda. We are in a slightly strange situation now. Hon. Members have referred to the disappointing figures that were released recently, but they are now quite significantly out of date. As the Child Poverty Action Group and others have said, we already have measures in place from the 2008 Budget, and some from the 2007 Budget as well, that will help to lift another 500,000 children out of poverty. We should not lose sight of the fact that certain measures have not yet come into effect, but are still moving the Government's trajectory towards meeting the target in the right direction.

I shall focus on one small aspect of the report, because the three Committee members who have spoken have already talked in detail about things such as child care, the take-up of benefits, and "better off in work" calculations. I shall explore the broader issue of how we make the political case for tackling child poverty. That is increasingly important now. Perhaps the public's attitude was more sympathetic when people generally felt quite well off, but when they start to feel the pinch in their own pockets as food and fuel prices rise and they feel that things are not quite as rosy as they were, it is even more difficult to make the case for redistribution from the better-off to the people who need it the most.

I was struck by the reference in the report to evidence that the public tend not to believe that poverty really exists in the UK. That was mentioned a lot when, with the Chairman of the Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), and other Members of Parliament, I took part in a discussion yesterday with people from the Joseph Rowntree Foundation and others. Now, people tend to think of poverty as something that is seen in Darfur—people living on the brink of starvation in desperate circumstances. They quite easily dismiss claims about poverty in the UK with comments such as, "Oh, you can't afford a new pair of trainers." They think that that is all it is. The case needs to be made.

I was struck by this statement in the report:

> "Long-term economic stability in the UK means the public tend to feel there is no excuse for poverty; it is the result of bad choices and wrong priorities, and therefore not a subject for public help."

The report also states:

> "The public believe that social relations within society are breaking down due to antisocial behaviour; the real problem is seen as 'emotional poverty', not lack of physical or concrete resources."

The Committee cites research from 2007 by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation and Ipsos MORI to back that up. It is a telling point. To an extent, such attitudes are nothing new. In the past, distinctions have been drawn between the so-called deserving and undeserving poor. The media and certain politicians have focused on attacks on feckless single mothers, workshy scroungers, or benefit fraudsters—often straying into racist territory. We are all familiar with stories—grossly distorted—about immigrants and asylum seekers coming to Britain to take advantage of our generous benefits system.

I do not deny that some people out there play the system. They are in it for what they can get and they do not feel that they have any reciprocal responsibility to society. We know that some people do not want to work. We see that in our constituencies and in the press. However, for every person I see at my surgeries, hear about from other constituents or read about in the local press who might fall into that category, I come across many, many more who are desperate to get themselves out of the situation in which they find themselves. They know how soul destroying, demeaning and exhausting poverty can be and they do not want that for their children. There is an intergenerational cycle whereby children who are brought up in poverty tend to go on to be poor themselves—poverty is passed on from generation to generation. Although some people do not have aspirations for themselves, many more are quite willing to move into work; they just need help and support to do that and the Government policies that can point them in the right direction.

As I said, the research on public attitudes revealed that people believe that poverty is the result of people making the wrong choices and having the wrong attitudes and the wrong priorities—that the problem is emotional poverty. There has been a recent public focus on what, rather than the undeserving poor, could be termed the dysfunctional poor. The focus is not so much on people as economic participants but on people's behaviour. To some extent, the media these days are almost celebrating dysfunctionality in families. I do not want to give yet more publicity to certain television shows, but Members probably know the sort that I mean—the sort of show, for instance, in which someone having a DNA test live on television is thought to be a good way of announcing to the world who a child's parent is. There is something seriously wrong with that.

We see that attitude also in relation to certain celebrities. One young woman, who obviously has serious mental health and drug problems, shares my name. I often walk into the newsagents and see headlines saying "Kerry on the verge of collapse", "Kerry back in rehab", "Kerry's drugs hell", "Kerry not fit to be a mother" and so on. That is presented as entertainment, but for celebrities income is not a problem. At a lower level in the media, however, dysfunctional families are paraded as if they were entertainment.

That may be partly because, as has been said, there has not been so much of a focus lately on economic issues. If people feel relatively well off, they will not be so concerned that their money is being used to support those unemployed people who want to be unemployed. However, there is now more of a pejorative element—it is more a moral judgment about people's other choices, rather than specifically about work.

That element is linked in part to the fact that, for laudable reasons, the Government have focused on antisocial behaviour and their Respect agenda. That is entirely laudable and something that should certainly be pursued, but it has moved the debate on a little. Instead of it being about people who live in poverty and deprivation in difficult circumstances, it is now seen as being about families who have drug and drink problems, who may suffer domestic violence, or who are involved in criminal activity or prostitution. That is what people think of when the subject of poor families is raised. The focus is important.

[Kerry McCarthy]

The Government's Families at Risk review is concentrating on those families that have multiple disadvantages, and that is to be welcomed. However, focusing only on those families, and seeing poverty just as something associated with that sort of dysfunction, does a grave disservice to those who are on relatively modest incomes and lead relatively modest lives but who are struggling to keep above the breadline.

We know that 50 per cent. of children who live in poverty have one or more parents in work and that they have relatively normal lifestyles. It is about making work pay, being able to afford transport, being able to meet those unexpected costs, such as when the fridge stops working, or when the car that one needs to get to work breaks down. Rises in the price of fuel and food will have a disproportionate impact on the poor.

I shall not go back into the detail of what has already been said. I think that the Government are on the right lines with the packages that they are trying to deliver to people to make them better off in work. I am more concerned about what could be the subjective judgment on whether a person is better off in work. We have heard that the calculations are complex. However, we need to deal with the sort of situation described by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen), of someone having to prove that child care is not available.

I am thinking of a particular scenario. In Bristol, public transport is pretty appalling. Someone who has a part-time job, perhaps in the new retail development that is soon to open in Bristol city centre, will have to fit that job around getting one child to a child minder and getting the other child to school and then getting the bus into work, and after work having to be at the school gates in time to pick up one kid and then go to the child minder to pick up the other one. If the buses are persistently late or do not turn up at all, that element can throw the whole arrangement out. On paper, the authorities can say, "We've done the sums. You can afford the child care with the help of child care tax credits. You can afford the bus fares and this and that." But if the bus does not turn up and the bus company does not admit that the buses are running late, which happens, the whole thing goes out of the window.

We have heard figures on how many lone parents work—I believe that it is about 30 per cent.—but I wonder how many of them are in longer-term jobs. The lone parents whom I know tend to work for three months or six months, but find it too much of a struggle and go back on benefit; a few months later, they are struggling on benefits, and they decide to try another option. They have a succession of low-paid, casual and temporary jobs, and it is difficult for them to sustain the kind of job that would lead to a career or to them acquiring more skills.

Tom Levitt: My hon. Friend may like to know that when the Committee visited Cardiff to see Jobcentre Plus working with lone parents, great emphasis was placed on the advisers remaining as advisers to the lone parents once they had gone into work. They were advising them for several months. That proved to be a much better way of avoiding the revolving door problem. I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that if every jobcentre did that, and did it to that extent, employment would be much more sustainable.

Kerry McCarthy: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. Ongoing advice is important, especially on things like managing debt and benefits.

The subject has been touched upon, but there are also problems with the administration of housing benefit and tax credits. As constituency MPs, we all know of people who have been billed the wrong amount for electricity, or who have similar problems. Having someone available to give guidance is important, because small things like that can mean that being in work is not sustainable. It might not even be the financial impact; the stress caused by trying to juggle and deal with the various agencies may be another factor.

It is generally accepted that all political parties are signed up to the agenda. I hope that we will hear from the Liberal Democrat and Conservative spokesmen not only what they believe the Government should be doing but what their parties will do. In particular, I would be pleased to hear from the Conservative spokesman what his party means by an "aspiration" to abolish child poverty and how that differs from a target or commitment.

The Opposition have been wary of state intervention to tackle poverty—measures such as tax credits, the minimum wage and the other tools that we use to fulfil our aspiration of meeting the 2010 and 2020 targets. If the Conservative party believes in state intervention, I would be interested to hear what form it will take. The party leader, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), has said that the Conservatives will be judged on how they tackle poverty, but many voters would like to make that judgment before the next election rather than having to wait until afterwards before getting a glimpse of the party's policies.

At the moment, all that we have to rely upon is one stark statistic, which has already been quoted. It is that between the late 1970s and the mid-1990s, the proportion of children living in households on less than 60 per cent. of the median income more than doubled. As some hon. Members have said, it is disappointing that the Government have so far managed to lift only 600,000 children out of poverty, but I have been told by the various organisations involved in the End Child Poverty coalition that if the Government had not introduced the measures that they have, another 1.7 million children would be living in poverty. The number would not have remained static; even more children would be affected. I look forward to hearing from the Liberal Democrat and Conservative spokespeople, and the Minister, how we can achieve our targets.

Ann Winterton (in the Chair): I call Andrew Selous. No, I am so sorry. I call Annette Brooke.

4.8 pm

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): Thank you, Lady Winterton. I welcome this first opportunity to serve under your chairmanship.

I congratulate the Work and Pensions Committee on its extensive report, "The Best Start in Life?", and the Committee Chairman, the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), on presenting the report to the House today. I may not be quite so enthusiastic about the Government's written response, and I hope for a better verbal response today.

We have heard some interesting and wide-ranging speeches. I may pick up on a few of the points that were raised. As we rapidly approach the deadline for the target of halving child poverty by 2010, it is helpful to note that progress has been made, with 600,000 fewer children in poverty when the report was published. I congratulate the Government on that progress. I well remember how much child poverty grew in the 1980s. I do not need to look at the statistics. That time is embedded in my memory.

More recently, however, we have seen the publication of the latest figures, which show that the number of children living in poverty has increased by 100,000. That rise, which has occurred for the second year running, is cause for serious concern, and it makes our debate particularly pertinent, given the Government's response. This is not a time to be complacent or proud simply of setting targets and having aspirations. For the sake of our children and future generations, we must make better progress.

The latest figures represent a setback to the Government's achieving the 2010 target, and although the recent Budget changes will make some difference, there is a consensus that much more action is needed, especially if both the 2010 target and the longer-term goal of eradicating child poverty by 2020 are to be achieved. In addition, it has always been known that although some families need only a small change in circumstances to take them out of poverty, the more marginalised families who live in persistent poverty will be much harder to reach.

It is important to make the position clear both before and after housing costs are taken into account. I agree with the Committee that after-housing-cost data better reflect standards of living, especially in areas of high housing costs. Changes to benefits and tax credits for families with children have helped to lift a substantial number of children above the poverty line. However, it is a great irony that the policy of tax credits and the complexity of the system have plunged some families into poverty. Families have been overpaid and the money subsequently clawed back, sometimes in a very unsympathetic manner. There are also complexities in the child care element of the working tax credit. The guide alone is 23 pages long. We need reform and simplification of such things. The Committee rightly draws attention to the low take-up and the problems that are recounted by many of the poorest families.

The expansion of child care provision and other policies aimed at reducing the number of out-of-work families have undoubtedly had a positive impact on reducing child poverty. The Committee rightly flagged up the difficult balance between the provision of quality child care and affordable child care, and the availability of child care for working parents during school holidays and for parents who work long hours or part-time.

I was concerned to read in a recent report on research by the National Centre for Social Research that "in terms of older children, only 17 per cent. of parents are using...after school clubs. This figure has not changed since 2004".

When I have tried to obtain information on the provision of extended schools by parliamentary question, I have been told that the information is not collected centrally. Similarly, it is difficult to get a clear picture of how much holiday provision is available. That ties in with the duty under the Childcare Act 2006 to provide sufficient child care. I remain concerned about the extent and cost of that much needed provision, particularly in deprived areas. With the change in policy that requires lone parents with older children to register for work, the extended schools programme is important, as are the problems of affordability and parents applying for the tax credits for which they are eligible.

The Government have made considerable investment in Sure Start, but the latest evaluations continue to show that the most disadvantaged are not being reached. I therefore agree entirely with the Committee's recommendation on reaching out into the community and the assessment of the impact of investment on poverty eradication.

The involvement of Jobcentre Plus is vital, but we should ensure that workless families receive more support for child care, because that would be a way of providing extra early-years provision to the most needy children, thereby breaking into the cycle of deprivation. It could also enable parents to take a step towards accessing training. I well remember hearing a story of a woman who, aged 40, I think, received the first certificate of her life. The certificate was for completing a swimming course. That lady was enthusiastic to go on and take more courses. Training that does not qualify for child care provision might be the first step on the training ladder.

Quality child care needs qualified staff—of that I am absolutely convinced. We have a problem in this country with our early-years provision. We have taken enormous steps since 1997, but we started at a terribly low level. We have incredibly low-paid workers in child care and low qualification levels, and all the evidence shows that poor-quality child care can be damaging, particularly for deprived children. The challenge is enormous, as is the mismatch of the provision of places, which the Committee brought to our attention. We must have sufficient good-quality places available where they are actually needed, and we must not waste money on providing places where it appears that they are not needed, give or take some surplus places, which will happen because there is a market.

The Committee accepted the case for greater conditionality on lone parents to seek work, but I agree that sanctions should never apply when there is a proven lack of affordable and suitable child care—however that can be proved—or when the lone parent is engaged in work-related education or training. I am especially worried about pressures on the parents of disabled children, for whom appropriate child care is so hard to find and likely to be expensive. Many partnerships break up because of the demands of looking after a disabled child, and we need to consider carefully making a lone parent work in such circumstances. More than a quarter of parents with a disabled child are lone parents. Currently, 84 per cent. of mothers of disabled children do not work. Against that, it costs on average three times as much to raise a child with a complex impairment than a non-disabled child.

The Government are consulting on extending the right to request flexible working. I wish that that process had started much earlier, so that there was a prospect of the measure lining up with the timing of the new requirements on people to seek work once their children reach certain ages. Half the children living in poverty come from households in which at least one parent is in work. Clearly, we need to make progress toward better paid and sustainable work. Several Members this afternoon have described so well the in-and-out-of-work pattern that is so disruptive to family life. Obviously, we need to encourage education, training and mentoring, as well as to make work pay and beneficial for lower-income families. We need to look at the costs of entering the labour market and ensure that people are supported.

[Annette Brooke]

Several Members asked, "Is it worth people going back to work?" The Committee concluded that the complexity of calculating the value of lost passported benefits makes it difficult for people to know whether they are better off in work. It recommended that the Government increase the earnings disregard for out-of-work benefits to improve the incentives for people to work in mini-jobs. I agree strongly with both points and I am sad that the Government are so dismissive of them. Mini-jobs are means by which a person can get on the first step to full-time employment. We must accept that when people or members of their family have not worked for a long time, it takes more than one simple step to get back into the labour market.

Families with disabled children remain disproportionately likely to be in poverty. The risk of poverty is increasing faster for families with disabled children than for any other group. Families with disabled children are 50 per cent. more likely to be in debt and 50 per cent. less likely to be able to afford holidays, new clothes, school outings or treats for their children than other families.

I should like to mention a letter that I received from a constituent and to make a plea to the Minister—this is slightly off-topic but it is relevant to the debate. My constituent, who has a severely disabled child and has received great support for the adaptation of her house, applied to the family fund for financial assistance and was surprised to learn that the income threshold for getting help in England is £23,000 per annum, which does not take into account housing costs or the number of children in the family. She is in a position to get absolutely nothing, as the family's income has just increased.

I represent a constituency in Dorset, where housing costs are very high in relation to wages. That is well known. Purbeck, for example, has the sixth highest ratio in the country in that respect. It is a problem. My constituent asks whether there is any hope that the Government will respond to a request to increase funding from the family fund, as it would help some of the most deserving, such as families with disabled children. It makes a big difference to such families just to have the possibility of a few days' holiday, or whatever the request for assistance involves.

The Select Committee recommends a review of disability allowance, measures to improve the take-up of that allowance and the extension of the winter fuel allowance to families with disabled children under five. I was sad that the Government agreed only with the second recommendation, because the winter fuel allowance will become more and more important, given the rise in fuel prices that so many Members have mentioned.

Other groups besides families with disabled children are more likely to suffer from poverty: large families, black and ethnic minority children, Traveller children, children leaving care and asylum seekers. Children in those groups are the most socially excluded and are faced with inequality and poor social mobility. If we are to reduce child poverty permanently, we must solve those problems. We can talk about the extra spending needed, but the reduction must be sustainable. That entails breaking the vicious cycle of deprivation and inequality that makes children who grow up in poor families far more likely to be poor themselves. Britain consistently performs poorly in OECD studies of social mobility, and the UK came bottom in most measures in last year's UNICEF report.

The strong relationship between family income and educational attainment indicates the desperate need to form policies aimed at tackling inequality across society. That involves targeting funding at the poorest and most disadvantaged sections of society in order to improve opportunities for all. One Liberal Democrat policy that I might mention is the pupil premium, which would attach additional funding directly to pupils identified as disadvantaged. The idea is for the funding to follow the pupil to whatever school the pupil attends. I was challenged to mention a few policies.

Mr. Rooney: Don't worry about it.

Annette Brooke: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there are plenty of them. The Liberal Democrats are proud to have signed up to the child poverty targets. That is not a vacuous promise.

I felt that the Government were dismissive of the costs of going to school. It is true that there are ways around some of the problems mentioned, but uniforms are another problem. I know that the Government have considered whether some schools use specific uniforms as a method of selection. I have a large comprehensive school in my constituency. I do not think for a moment that it uses the uniform as a way of interfering with admissions, but its PE polo shirt has a logo, which effectively prevents parents from going to supermarkets, some of which, I am told, produce polo shirts very cheaply. Such matters become real barriers. There is a stigma. I taught for a long time at an independent school where no stigma attached to girls with second-hand uniforms; it was a matter of course. However, it does not work like that for someone who is very poor. It is not right. It does not give self-esteem to have second-hand uniforms.

It is well documented in the 2007 UNICEF report that the Scandinavian countries, in contrast with the UK, scored highly on all measures, including those dealing with child poverty. What can we learn from those countries? I know that one hon. Member was not keen on following the Swedish model, but it should be noted that, although Sweden has a high proportion of single parents, a high proportion of them are in work. There must be lessons that we can learn from Sweden about how to avoid disincentives and to make it easier and more beneficial for parents to work. Scandinavian countries are in an enviable position, with high-quality child care, good early-years services, family centres and excellent parental leave. I say to the Government that we have come a long way since 1997, but it is such a huge journey.

John Penrose: Does the hon. Lady accept that although the achievements of Scandinavian countries are tremendously impressive, they start from a different position? They are smaller societies with lower populations, which are much more ethnically and racially homogenous than this country's. They have different issues, and their solutions may not transport across precisely to a country such as Britain.

Annette Brooke: I simply think that they are worth considering. Sweden, for example, does have issues relating to ethnic minorities; perhaps those countries have some of the same problems that we have here.

Poverty affects many aspects of a child's well-being, including health, cognitive development, achievement at school, aspirations, relationships and future employment. We must identify what action can be taken quickly to combat poverty. Equally, we should take up the Select Committee's recommendation that alongside every change to taxes and benefits, the Government should publish a memorandum indicating the expected impact on child poverty. How useful it would have been to have had one last year, when it was announced that the Government were going to get rid of the 10p tax rate. Had they had one, the Government would not be scrambling to untangle the effects on poverty a year later. It is difficult to do so now—even the measures proposed will still leave 1 million people worse off. The same applies to the vehicle excise duty on cars. I am in favour of new cars having proportionately higher VED, depending on their carbon emissions, but the measure adopted is hard on people with seven-year-old cars, for instance, who live in rural areas such as the one I represent. They will be severely affected by it.

Not much has been said about rural poverty. Increased transport and fuel costs will have an impact in rural areas. Affordable housing is an issue for those who live in rural communities, and there are many more. We must work together, as has been suggested; but we must also try to think outside the box and ensure that a foot is on the accelerator the whole time.

Ann Winterton (in the Chair): I call Andrew Selous, having almost given him a heart attack a few minutes ago.

4.28 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Lady Winterton, I am sure that you would never give me a heart attack, but I thank you for your consideration. It is a pleasure to serve under you this afternoon, and to be back in Westminster Hall debating reports by the Work and Pensions Committee. I was a member of the Committee during the whole of the last Parliament, and I remember many happy Thursday afternoons spent here debating reports, including the report "Child Poverty in the UK", the second report of the 2003-04 Session, to which I shall refer this afternoon.

I congratulate everyone who has spoken. Everyone here comes to the subject with passion, interest, different perspectives and detailed knowledge from their constituencies in different parts of the country. That is valuable, and it has added a lot of colour and local detail to our important debate. I shall add one or two perspectives from my own area of the country.

It is important to put the matter in context. Child poverty, sadly, has risen for the second year in a row: by 200,000 before housing costs and by 300,000 after housing costs. Some 2.9 million children are now in poverty, on a before-housing-cost basis, and 3.9 million on an after-housing-cost basis. Those figures are the same as those in 2002, so regrettably we have not made any progress on that incredibly important issue over the past four years.

The situation is even more worrying than that, however, when we consider the number of children living in severe poverty, which is defined as children living in households with less than 40 per cent. of median income. According to an analysis by the Institute for Fiscal Studies, in March 2007, that figure has increased by 600,000, from 2.5 million to 3.1 million, and a report last year by Save the Children stated that 1.3 million children in the UK are living in severe poverty. Although we want all children out of poverty—taking the 60 per cent. definition—I hope that other Members will join with me in saying that it is urgent that we do the most to help the poorest. I hope that that is common ground for us all.

The Treasury Committee's report on the 2007 comprehensive spending review made the point:

"It is important that efforts to meet targets do not lead to an insufficient concentration upon the worst forms of child poverty in the very poorest households."

That is a comment on the Government's overall approach of trying to deal with child poverty through the tax and benefits system, although that must be integral to our approach—that should answer the question raised by the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy). I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose) that we need a more broad-based approach, particularly to the pathways leading to poverty, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) said in his report, "Breakthrough Britain".

The Joseph Rowntree Foundation—not linked to the Conservative party in any known way—said that the its words, not mine. I shall not refer to the UNICEF report, because the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) has already quoted from it quite extensively, other than to say that the UK was voted lowest out of 21 OECD countries for child well-being.

"strategy against poverty and social exclusion pursued since the late 1990s is now largely exhausted";

Tom Levitt: I notice that the hon. Gentleman did not refer to the anti-poverty strategy prior to 1997 when there really were gateways into poverty. Will he acknowledge that the UNICEF report, to which I think that he is referring, contained no data for 2004 and after, and that the bulk of the data actually related to the 1990s?

Andrew Selous: What I do know is that the Government have a tendency not to like any report that is not favourable towards them—they do not seem to like the OECD and EUROSTAT figures, nor a range of other critical figures with which they appear to have difficulties. Furthermore, according to the Department's analysis of its own productivity, between 2002 and 2007, published in February of this year, the 2010 targets "are unlikely to be fully met".

[Andrew Selous]

Both the Joseph Rowntree Foundation and the Department's own research say that. Surely there is a case for changing direction and for a frank reassessment of Government policy. We all want these shared targets to be met, but given that we have gone backwards and failed to make progress over the past four years, there is an argument for looking at the matter more widely.

Paragraph 303 of the Work and Pensions Committee's 2003-04 report, "Child Poverty in the UK", stated:

> "If child poverty really is to be abolished, the Government's anti-poverty programme must reach beyond raising incomes, and address the human dimension of poverty in a holistic way—increasing good parenting, aiding family stability, raising levels of educational attainment and healthcare and thus boosting children's life chances."

Of course the Government have acted in most of those areas, although not all of them, but I am not convinced that they believe that those other areas are integral to achieving our objectives.

On social mobility, I am sure that I am not alone in being appalled by the fact that a boy born poor in 1970 has a 38 per cent. probability of remaining poor as an adult, when in 1958 the figure was 31 per cent. As a Conservative, that offends me deeply. I think that everyone here would want bright children from the lowliest backgrounds to be able to achieve their undoubted potential. The fact that only a quarter of pupils on free school meals gained five good GCSEs, compared with half for the overall population, is also deeply worrying. That shows how entrenched some of these characteristics are and that we need to intervene early.

The hon. Member for Bristol, East challenged me to come out with some of our policies. I think that I can partially reassure her, because we have a number of policies in place—we do not yet have the full suite, not least because at my latest count the Government have taken nine of our principal policies, and we would like to keep one or two in the locker until the general election. The report by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, "Breakthrough Britain", has been largely acknowledged by independent commentators with no link to the Conservative party as one of the most serious pieces of work on poverty by any political party in recent times.

I shall return to school reform and how we can give children the best possible chances of turning their lives around so that they are not condemned to poverty for their entire lives. I am pleased that following our debate on the use of synthetic phonics in teaching children to read, it became a common cause. We have also proposed creating more than 220,000 good new school places through expanding the academies programme innovatively, and we want to ensure that money will be targeted at the poorest pupils, with more money made available for children from the poorest backgrounds through a pupil premium, so that we get rid of the disgraceful statistic that I just raised: that children on free school meals do half as well in their exams.

There are also human factors at work, however, for which the Government cannot be directly responsible through legislation. When some children, from rich or poor families, go home at the end of day, and walk through the door, they will be grabbed by the parent or carer, fed, sat down and told to get on with their homework. In other homes, a parent might not be available, because they are out, and in others the attitude towards school work will be completely different. That is not an indication, per se, of material advantage. I accept that it is more difficult in poorer homes, because the parents might be working antisocial hours, and other difficulties might be at play. But I could take Members to plenty of poor homes in my constituency where education is really valued and parents ensure that homework is done. We cannot demand that the Government deliver on that, but why is the high value placed on education by some of our immigrant communities not prevalent among the population as a whole? That human factor is critical in dealing with some of the very important issues raised by the Select Committee.

The Committee's report mentioned soft skills and getting people ready and fit for work. What key disciplines does a person require if an employer is to be hungry for their services? I would put reliability and self-discipline pretty high on that list. An employer wants someone who will turn up, do what they are asked to do and be trustworthy. If children who are in difficult family circumstances are not getting those skills, what is the role of institutions? Schools have a huge role to play in developing those attitudes and qualities in children, but so do organisations such as the scouts and cadets, which the Government—all credit to them—are talking about expanding. If children are not getting those skills and disciplines at home, through their family relationships, such organisations can play a key role in achieving the outcomes that the Select Committee is rightly looking for.

The Conservatives are absolutely signed up to the notion of work as the best route for getting children out of poverty. It is not the only route—there is absolutely a role for direct state intervention—but we see work as the primary way of doing that. The Government have stated that that is their intention, but the UK has the highest proportion of workless households in the whole of the European Union, including countries such as Bulgaria and Romania. That statistic is from the 2007 EUROSTAT figures. That is surely an indictment of our country's ability to participate fully in the labour market.

The hon. Member for Bristol, East asked me for some policies. We have come out with innovative welfare reform policies, and the Government are moving in the same direction; indeed, only the Liberal Democrats are not. We think that every claimant who may be able to work should be engaged in full-time activity as part of the back-to-work process. In some cases, that will be through mandatory community work for the long-term unemployed. That might seem callous and unkind, but I argue that it is exactly the opposite. We all know that the longer people are out of the labour market, the less work-ready they are. They are less able to get up early enough to get to work every morning and they lose the ability to get on with the people whom they would have to work alongside.

We want to enable and give much more freedom to private providers, and pay them by results only when they have got people into sustained work. I assure Labour Members that we would structure contracts in such a way that they would not cherry-pick. There must be help for those who are furthest from the labour market as well as those who are easy to approach.

Mr. Rooney: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Andrew Selous: I know that the hon. Gentleman disagrees regarding this area, and I am delighted to take an intervention from him.

Mr. Rooney: I do not disagree at all. What the hon. Gentleman has just proposed has already happened, so why does he want to reinvent the wheel? Contracts have already been let and structured in that way.

Andrew Selous: I am pleased to hear that, but my conversations with people such as Debbie Scott from Tomorrow's People lead me to believe that there is further to go. The Government are complacent about the state of the labour market. There are more jobs than ever, but if this country has the highest number of workless households, there is much more to be done in this area if we are to tackle child poverty. We can go further, and we need to consider new methods—not from a particular political philosophy, but based on what will work. Much of what David Freud has said is good. Providers such as Tomorrow's People have been outstanding and their results speak for themselves.

With regard to the labour market, which is key to dealing with these issues, I am informed by the Statistics Commission that, since 1997, between 53 and 81 per cent. of the new jobs created in this country have gone to foreign nationals. In many cases, they have provided vital skills, but there are people of all races, colours and backgrounds in our welfare system—nearly 5 million people on a range of out-of-work benefits. Our first duty is to make sure that such people, of all races and nationalities, are not in the welfare system for years, but come into the labour market.

Using work as a means of reducing child poverty is a primary focus, and I am concerned about the tripartite agreement in the child poverty unit. I understand that the lead Department for child poverty is the Treasury and that the unit is physically located in the Department for Children, Schools and Families, so the Minister is, in a sense, the junior partner of the three Departments, which is a great shame. Responsibility for child poverty should be firmly centred in the DWP, with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions being accountable for meeting targets. He would certainly need to co-operate with other Departments, as well as the Treasury and DCSF, such as the Department for Communities and Local Government. We have heard about the problems with child care and local authorities, on which I have much sympathy with the comments of the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen).

I am not alone in worrying about the tripartite agreement. The Treasury Committee said in its report on the 2007 comprehensive spending review that "we remain to be convinced that the division of departmental responsibilities will not accentuate the possible tension between the 2010-11 target and the final target to eradicate child poverty."

We have heard excellent contributions on whether it pays to go back to work. I shall not repeat what has been said, but I should like to consider the issue from a slightly different perspective—marginal tax rates and the withdrawal of benefit income as people go into work. I think that we all agree that with a progressive form of taxation, the best-off should pay the most tax, but we have a system in which the poorest pay some of the highest rates of tax or have benefit income withdrawn.

Let me give some figures. Income support and jobseeker's allowance are withdrawn at 100 per cent., housing benefit and council tax at 85 per cent. and working tax credit at up to about 70 per cent. in many cases. In its "Benefits Simplification" report, the Work and Pensions Committee said that if 41 per cent.

"is the highest tax rate that it is right to expect a high-income earner to pay, how much worse it is that the government effectively charges low income earners more than twice that rate."

I agree. I also agree with earlier remarks on this issue.

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's comments with interest. What would his policy response be and how would he reduce those withdrawal rates?

Andrew Selous: I freely admit that it is not easy, but the Minister has all the clever people behind him and the very bright civil servants, a number of whom are in the Chamber, who are able to do that. In broad terms, we need to consider having a more gradual taper so that there is not such a dramatic cut-off. We have heard examples from Labour Members about people who are worse off. The Chairman of the Select Committee said that some people are £30, £40 or £50 worse off, in spite of the "better off in work" calculations telling them that they will be £25 better off. That particular case was probably because of the loss of passported benefits. If the benefit system were analysed in detail—I accept that that is serious work and is not something that the Department could do overnight—I think that that would be found to be a serious issue and a major barrier to getting people back into work. I commend to the Minister and his officials the need to consider that area.

The benefit system in this country, as opposed to most other OECD countries, to a marked degree treats couples much less favourably than single people. The Government's equivalisation tables say that a childless couple need about 75 per cent. of the combined incomes of two single people, as single people and single parents need to receive more, and a couple should not need twice as much. The Government say that a couple with two children need about 80 per cent. of the combined income of a lone parent and a single person.

However, when one analyses the benefit system in rather greater detail, one finds that workless couples receive only about 60 per cent. of the benefits received by two workless single people. There is a range of countries that have a different benefit system and do not discriminate against couples in the way that our benefit system does: Canada, Iceland, Germany, Luxembourg, Norway, Ireland, France, Belgium, Spain, Finland, Austria, Sweden, the Netherlands and Switzerland, to name just a few.

Mr. Rooney: Very briefly, the rates that we have today were set in 1988 under the Social Security Act 1986 and uprated by inflation. The opportunity was there in 1988 to do things differently. At that time, it was not thought right to do things differently, and it was not thought right to do things differently at any time up until 1997, so why the change now?

Andrew Selous: I am certainly not the sort of Conservative who defends everything that my party has done in the past. I say quite frankly to the hon. Gentleman that I do not think that the rates were right then and I do not think that they are right now; just because it is wrong now does not mean to say that it was right under a Conservative Government.

[Andrew Selous]

John Penrose: I am sure that my hon. Friend remembers that the level of single-parent family formation back in 1988 was dramatically lower than it is now, and therefore the problem is getting much worse in modern times.

Andrew Selous: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Let me just remind the Committee that children of separated parents are twice as likely to be in poverty as those of parents who remain together. Therefore, when I raise the issue in this debate, it is for no other purpose than wanting to reduce child poverty. As I say, the fact is that if someone is the child of separated parents, they are twice as likely to be poor than if they are fortunate enough to have parents who have stuck together.

It is interesting that, around the world, other Governments of the left seem to get this concept. Australia gets it, with Kevin Rudd's Government maintaining the focus on families that John Howard's Government introduced, with the family relationship centres. In President Clinton's welfare reform Bill, there was an explicit measure to promote marriage and the two-parent family. I also note that only last week Barack Obama, the Democratic candidate for the US presidency, was talking about the fact that in America, "children without a father are five times more likely to live in poverty and...nine times more likely to drop out of schools".

So I say to the Minister that I would love this issue not to be an area of difference between us. I can enjoy the situation politically, because I happen to think that the Government's policy is lousy and in a debate we can probably knock spots off it. However, I say to him that I genuinely do not want to go down that route. I would love it if he were to join those on the left and centre-left in Australia and America who realise the importance of family issues and the importance of strong, stable, committed families in reducing child poverty.

Again, it is not just me who is saying this. Let me quote a report from the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, entitled "What are today's social evils?" The report does not just reflect the foundation's views, but those of the people interviewed in its research. At the top of their list—this is not my preference as a Conservative that I am putting forward—was:

"The decline of the family: family breakdown and poor parenting were felt to cause many other social problems and leave young people particularly vulnerable."

The hon. Member for Bristol, East did the debate this afternoon a service by raising this issue. I say to her that it is definitely not an either/or situation. Reducing child poverty is not just about providing the money to help people to get out of poverty, or promoting these softer emotional commitment and family issues; it is a both/and situation, where both factors matter. I will accept that poverty leads to couples splitting up, when money is scarce, but I think that it works the other way round as well, in that, in any given set of circumstances, a more stable and committed family relationship helps children to stay out of poverty. As I say, that is reflected in the data; children whose parents separate are twice as likely to be poor.

Again, we have some proposals to improve matters within the working tax credit system. We will increase that credit by £38 a week, to try to do away with this couples penalty. That measure will help 1.8 million of the poorest couples with children, so there will be some big gainers from that.

In the family area, we have also said that we will increase the health visitor service. Under our proposals, the very youngest children will receive six hours of home support in the first two weeks; a visit every two weeks in the first six months; monthly visits in the next six months, and two visits a year between the ages of one and five. It is critical to do that work at those very early stages.

I would just like to raise briefly with the Minister the issue of people in poverty with mortgages as opposed to living in local authority housing. There are 2.56 million families with mortgages living in underlying poverty, as opposed to 2.75 million families in local authority housing living in underlying poverty. When I was on the Select Committee, various people who gave evidence were concerned about the former group: those with mortgages. I may have missed any reference to them in the current report—I do not know whether there is any reference to them—but it is an issue that should not be off the radar screen. There is a very significant issue with this group of people, too.

Regarding the debt that people get into, the issue of affordable credit is incredibly important for families that are existing on low income, for the reasons that the hon. Member for Bristol, East quite properly gave. Someone's fridge can stop working, or the classic example is that someone's boiler stops working in winter; if they do not have insurance, that situation can send many families totally over the edge.

Again, there is a major piece of work to be done on the area of affordable credit. I will not be specific or prescriptive now. However, I am not convinced that the social fund works nearly as effectively as it could or should. There are opportunities, perhaps through working with private finance, to expand greatly what the social fund does, perhaps in collaboration, or separately, or in addition to the work of credit unions and friendly societies. Financial literacy is also something that we need to look at, given that there is evidence that people are wasting up to £700 a year by taking poor financial decisions.

Can I please encourage the Minister to do more on the issue of pre-payment meters? We had a recent pledge on this matter, but it really is scandalous that the poorest are paying most for their fuel. I raised this issue in the House on 23 March 2006; I was told then that nothing could be done. The current Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs called for action on this issue in 2000, when he was a Back Bencher, and he has been in the Cabinet since 2003. This issue has been around for a long time; many people from all parts of the House have raised it, and with fuel prices as high as they are and possibly going up by another 40 per cent. next winter, as we have heard yesterday and today in the news, something needs to be done urgently.

I was particularly shocked to see in paragraphs 381 and 382 of the Committee's report that "up to £9.4 billion are not being claimed in means tested benefits by those who are entitled to them."

The report goes on to say that

"up to £4.5 billion of Working Tax Credit and Child Tax Credit" is also not claimed. As the report says, that is nearly £14 billion of unclaimed income. We have heard this afternoon calls for £3 billion to be spent and yet if everyone had claimed what they are entitled to, the Minister would be writing a cheque for £14 billion. Perhaps there is something that I do not fully understand about those figures and perhaps the Minister will explain them clearly to the Committee and me when he comes to reply, but that issue of unclaimed benefits definitely jumped out at me when I read the report.

We have had good contributions to the debate on the issue of disabled families. I will only add to those contributions by saying that improvements in the take-up of disability living allowance are particularly vital to improving matters.

The differentiation between different ethnic groups in terms of poverty is another issue that absolutely screams out at me, and I am pleased to say that it was addressed in the report.

I will just return to the point about pockets of deprivation, which was raised earlier. At Marsh Farm in Luton, millions and millions of pounds have been poured in through the new deal for communities programme, and yet my constituency has streets and areas that are just as poor, and that are only a mile or two away, but are not eligible for those sorts of budgets. There is a real issue of fairness here; if someone is poor, they cannot pay their bills and life is really tough. Just because they are in an area that is slightly wealthier, why should they miss out on this massive amount of regeneration funding that is going into some areas but not others?

My final point is that I completely agree with the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole on the issue of vehicle excise duty. It is another Labour proposal that will hit the poorest hardest; it will be the 10p tax rate on wheels and I urge the Minister to take action on that issue too.

4.59 pm

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): I begin by welcoming the report, which has given us the opportunity to have this useful and interesting debate. I congratulate the Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), and I thank the Select Committee for its work and for the attention that it rightly focused on this important subject.

I am sorry that one or two Members suggested that they thought the Government's response was somewhat complacent. I assure the Committee and the House that that certainly was not intended, and that there is absolutely no sense of complacency on my part or on the part of any of my colleagues about the scale of the challenge that we face and the importance of achieving the targets that we have set. Those targets have been agreed across the House this afternoon.

It is time to see the back of child poverty. It has no place in a prosperous modern society. We need every child to grow up enjoying experiences and opportunities that will enable them to fulfil their potential later in life. Organisations such as the Child Poverty Action Group, which was referred to, warmly welcomed our substantial commitment to tackling child poverty. A financial commitment of £1 billion or so was made recently. I thought it a little unfair, after that big commitment, which was widely welcomed, to complain that there were no further announcements in the Government's response, but that is by the bye. It is clear from the scale of the commitment that we made recently, at a time of substantial fiscal pressure, just how firmly committed the Government are to achieving their targets.

I say to the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) that I certainly do not regret the fact that the Treasury has the lead on this matter. I have no doubt at all that that is part of the reason why in the Budget we were able to go so far in the direction that people have been calling for in this debate. That underlines the Government's commitment, and that is where the matter sits.

Harry Cohen: Does the Minister think that the Government will meet the 2010 target?

Mr. Timms: We are committed to achieving the target. If hon. Members look at the numbers, we have reduced child poverty by 600,000 so far—

Andrew Selous: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Timms: Let me answer the question first, if I may. We have made announcements that we hope and expect will lift an estimated 500,000 above the poverty line—slightly less than the figure that my hon. Friend gave. Of course, there may be a drift upwards over the next couple of years because of other things that are happening, but it is clear from that and from the progress that we have made in recent announcements that we are within reach of the 2010 target. We are determined to achieve it.

Andrew Selous: I just want to check this. The Minister said he had reduced poverty by 600,000. Is it not now 500,000, given the 100,000 increase?

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point, and I entirely understand why he did so. I have some sympathy with the question, but the statisticians tell us that the number is still 600,000. The reason is that the figures can be estimated only to the nearest 100,000; therefore, to the nearest 100,000, the reduction in child poverty is now 600,000, as it was last year. In that sense, we have not gone backwards. I am not a statistician, or at least I have not been one for a long time, so I shall not go further and explain how rounding works, but that is the statisticians' advice. It is important to point out that although the survey showed a reduction, it was not significant enough to change the figure.

The Committee is right to say that poverty constrains children's health and happiness. That point was firmly and rightly underlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North. It makes it harder to succeed at school and to gain skills and qualifications to get on in life. Too many children suffer a poverty of expectations and aspirations, and they do not look forward to a bright future in the way that all of us would wish every child to be able to do.

[Mr. Timms]

Tackling child poverty is a moral imperative, but it is also an economic necessity. Inequality and disadvantage in communities make them more likely to suffer from crime and antisocial behaviour, and to lack social capital that they can draw on to prosper. That is why, for a strong economy as well as a strong society, the Government made a commitment in 1999 to eradicate child poverty in a generation, and to halve it by 2010.

Last week, as a contrast to gloomy news about the world economy, the monthly employment figures showed that the number of people in work in the UK had hit a new record: 29.55 million, the largest number ever. The number claiming unemployment benefit went up a little as well, but it remained in the low 800,000s. The last time the number claiming unemployment benefit was that low was in 1975.

It is 10 years since the new deal was introduced. What can we say about the progress of reform since then? It is true that the claimant count has been reduced by almost half, but that is only a partial measure of worklessness. A better yardstick is the number claiming all the out of work benefits: incapacity benefit, lone parent benefit, income support for others and jobseeker's allowance. The number has fallen by almost 20 per cent. since 1997, from 5.5 million to 4.45 million on the latest figures, which are for May last year. It is interesting to look at the graph: the fall has been sustained and consistent. That is an important and substantial achievement. We have delivered what we said we would deliver, and moved people from welfare to work.

But it is also clear that there is still more to do. That is important for children, as the experiences of many people whom I meet underline. Last week I was in Paisley, just outside Glasgow, and I visited one of the GP surgeries where Jobcentre Plus pathways to work advisers have been working. It appears that they are extremely effective. I met a lone parent with four children. She had been out of work looking after her children for a long time. She wanted to get back to work but did not think that it would be practical for the reasons that Members fairly raised in this debate: child care, being better off and so on. She did not think that it would be practical with four children. Her GP recommended that she speak to the Jobcentre Plus adviser. Last November, she started part-time work as a traffic warden, and she hopes to join the police force in due course. She told me that when she was unemployed she had zero confidence. She said, "People say they wouldn't believe I was the same person." Her life, and her children's lives, too, are being transformed through work and through the support that she has been given.

To pick up on an important point that came out in the exchange between my hon. Friends the Members for High Peak (Tom Levitt) and for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy), that lone parent continues to be in touch with the adviser whom she worked with at the GP surgery, as I saw for myself. She clearly finds that valuable. My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak said that he had seen that happening in Cardiff. Such support for lone parents going into work is now offered nationwide for six months. That is a good example of how we have been improving the system to help people overcome the undoubtedly substantial barriers that they face.

Andrew Selous: I am sure we are all delighted to hear that story, but if the labour market in this country is as robust and strong as the Minister says, why do we have the highest number of workless households in the whole of Europe?

Mr. Timms: We have far fewer than we used to have—there are 400,000 fewer. That is a reflection of the terrible starting point that we had in 1997. The hon. Gentleman was frank enough to say that he did not support everything that the previous Conservative Government had done. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East said, child poverty more than doubled during that period. I was in the House for the latter part of it, and there used to be a claim that there was no such thing as poverty in the UK. I very much welcome the fact that the Conservative party now recognises that there is a real problem that needs to be addressed. I shall come on in a moment to the policies that need to be put in place to address it.

My hon. Friend made a point about public views on the subject. I agree that we need to communicate to the public the compelling moral and economic case for eradicating child poverty. There is a job still to be done there. Organisations such as the CPAG, the End Child Poverty coalition and others can help us, and I warmly commend their contributions. "Ending child poverty: everybody's business", which was published at the time of the Budget, was a step in the right direction, but we need to do more to get messages across to the public and to persuade people that there are real problems behind the statistics.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North raised several important points. Let me respond to some of them. He made a point about the charge for music lessons and the difficulties that that has imposed on some children who find themselves excluded from part of the benefit of schooling as a result. We have committed £332 million over the next three years, so that by 2011 all children of primary school age will have had an opportunity to learn a musical instrument. I hope that that will be a significant step towards tackling the particular problem that he mentioned.

There were a couple of contributions about the higher incidence of poverty for disabled children than for children as a whole, and it is true that there is a higher incidence. However let me remind the House of the most recent statistics. The risk of poverty for disabled children in 2006-07 was 24 per cent., compared with a 22 per cent. risk of poverty for non-disabled children, so on the most recent data there is only a 2 per cent. difference between the two groups. Since 1998-99, the risk for disabled children has fallen from 30 per cent. to 24 per cent. There is still an issue that needs to be addressed, but, again, that is an example of our having been able to move in the right direction.

I agree with my hon. Friend about the need for people to understand that housing benefit is an in-work benefit as well; he is right about that. That is one reason why people are sometimes unwilling to take work and why the "better off in work" calculations are so important.

I listened to what hon. Members said about the "better off in work" calculations. The feedback that I have received, including from some of the organisations that have been mentioned, suggests that people mainly think that those calculations should be more readily available. People find those calculations useful: the woman in Paisley, whom I mentioned, did. Quite a lot of people find those figures to be a revelation and discover, once they get into work, that the calculations are correct. There is certainly no deception here.

I understand the argument for more information being provided on the cost of school meals, transport costs and so on, but it will be clear to anyone listening to the debate that that is the intention. The other criticism was that the information takes too long to get, is complicated and should be available instantly. However, working out bus fares, for example, cannot be done in a couple of minutes. Our approach is right. There is absolutely no deception. We are saying, "This is the basis for the figure that we are presenting to you. It does not include x, y and z. Other factors may need to be taken into account." If we try to include too much information, it will get impossibly complicated and will be less valuable. I have picked up on a big demand for such information to be more widely available.

I mentioned that we have now rolled out advice to lone parents nationally and, in addition to that, have in place an in-work emergency discretion fund to help lone parents with unforeseen financial problems in their first six months in work. That is a significant change, which recognises that the problems will not all necessarily be over on day one of employment: they may continue beyond that time.

My hon. Friends the Members for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) and for Bristol, East and the Committee Chair, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North, were dismayed about the comment in the Government's response on the absence of evidence of a concern about stigmatisation for those who receive free school meals. I accept that criticism. The Secretary of State wrote in March to all schools and local authorities, asking them what they can do to encourage families who are eligible for free school meals to take up that entitlement. We have developed a new system to simplify and streamline the way that local authorities check a family's eligibility. I was interested in the example from her constituency that my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East gave. I accept that, in that respect, the response should not have said what it did and that, perhaps, the criticism of complacency is justified. I apologise to the House for that comment having been included.

The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire talked about the number of jobs taken by non-UK nationals. More recent data have been produced showing that of the 3.2 million increase in the number of jobs since 1997, UK nationals have taken 55 per cent., or 1.8 million jobs, and foreign nationals have taken 1.4 million. He will acknowledge that the foreign nationals who have come to the UK have made a substantial contribution: they have worked hard and contributed to the UK economy. The fact that those people have come has been consistent with our having the lowest number of people claiming unemployment benefit since 1975. Non-UK nationals' contribution has been positive and has not been in contradiction with the aim of raising the number of people in employment in the UK.

I can also give the hon. Gentleman some updated data on the number of children on free school meals getting five or more good GCSEs. He makes a fair point about the gap. Some 35.5 per cent. of children in 2006-07 who were eligible for free school meals achieved five good GCSEs, compared with 62.8 per cent. of other children. The gap between the most disadvantaged schools and the rest narrowed by 19 per cent. between 1999 and 2005. We have a public service agreement target to narrow that gap further. The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight the gap. Again, we have made progress in that area, although there is more that we need to do.

Let me pick up on the hon. Gentleman's point, which I noted carefully, about commonly shared targets on child poverty. I think that I am right in saying that a spokesperson for his party has not previously referred to his party's having a target for eradicating child poverty. I am not sure whether what he said reflects a policy change, but if it does I certainly welcome that and look forward to hearing more details about how the Conservative party plans to deliver it. In a moment I shall make a couple of points about the Conservative party's policy in this area.

Andrew Selous: I should just like to clarify that it was not my intention to change the language that my party has used. If I have misled hon. Members on that point, I apologise. In politics it is better to under-promise than to cause disillusionment later.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that clarification, but disappointed. I thought that perhaps we had made a breakthrough there, but there we go.

The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose) rightly drew attention to the different ways in which we measure child poverty. First, since 1998, 600,000 children have been lifted out of relative poverty in the UK. I am grateful for the opportunity earlier to clarify that that figure has not changed in the past year. Secondly, we have seen a drop in persistent poverty since 1997 from 17 per cent. to 11 per cent. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) rightly drew particular attention to the importance of persistent poverty as a reflection of hardship. There has been an encouraging drop in that regard. The new material deprivation measure, which we have been recording only since 2004-05, has fallen by 200,000 since 2004-05.

I noted that the Institute for Fiscal Studies has made a number of points about the material deprivation measure. We shall, of course, listen carefully to points that people make. There is a widely held view, which is reflected in the consultation that we have carried out, that in measuring child poverty there should be some measure of living standards and day-to-day experiences as well as of income—not instead of, but as well as—and the material deprivation measure is an attempt to do that.

John Penrose: Before the Minister moves on from that point, will he confirm that his ministerial colleagues were incorrect when they said that the relative measure of poverty, which allows international comparisons, was in some way a flawed mechanism for comparing either pensioner poverty across different countries in Europe or, indeed, any other kind of poverty?

Mr. Timms: I reassure the hon. Gentleman that there is no slackening of our focus on the relative poverty measure, defined as those living in households below 60 per cent. of median income. However, the EUROSTAT database changed in 2005 from households with below average income to a general household resources survey, so it is difficult to make valid comparisons in the case to which the hon. Gentleman refers between different European countries. It is important that we should be able to make those comparisons internationally, which is one advantage of the 60 per cent. measure before housing costs in the case of child poverty, because that is the widely accepted definition and allows us to keep close track of how we are getting on compared with other countries.

[Mr. Timms]

Tom Levitt: Will my right hon. Friend say something about in-work poverty? The Government are right to say that for most people most of the time work should be the route out of poverty, but for too many people it is not and it is a route into a different sort of poverty. We must tackle in-work poverty as well as out-of-work poverty.

Mr. Timms: I agree. The incidence of poverty as a proportion is much lower in households where someone is in work. Nevertheless, a significant proportion of the overall number of children in poverty live in homes where one parent or another is in work. A variety of measures is needed. We announced recently that we will above-index the child element of the working tax credit over the next couple of years, and that will be a significant help, increasing the return to work for many.

The other area where we must be much more attentive—the Committee was right to draw attention to this—is in doing a better job of integrating employment support with skills support so that when people go to a job centre to look for work, they can get help with basic skills. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North referred to the 16-hour rule, and we are strongly committed to ensuring that the system allows people to undertake courses to address basic skills problems, and for skills health checks to be routine. There has been good progress, but we must improve the opportunities to train and to obtain skills as part of the process. One benefit is that people will be better able to progress when they go into work, to increase their income, and to move out of poverty. The combination of the tax credit system and promoting support for skills will allow us to make more progress. As a result of personal tax and benefit changes since 1997, by October 2008, families with children in the poorest fifth of the population will be on average more than £4,000 a year better off in real terms. Those reforms have been key to our progress.

I want to comment on the interesting point made by the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire—Conservative Members often draw attention to it—about severe poverty, and people living in households with incomes of less than 40 per cent. of the median. I want to draw his attention not to the 2007 report of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which he properly and fairly quoted, but to the 2008 report, which contains an extensive commentary on that point. The position essentially is that the statistics that the hon. Gentleman quoted are not reliable. The 2008 report's executive summary states that "children in households with less than 40 per cent. of median income—so called severe poverty—are on average less deprived than those in households with between 40 per cent. and 60 per cent. of median income".

It goes on to make the point that "at the very bottom of the income distribution"— that is—

"in the first and second percentiles, material deprivation scores are lower"

there is less deprivation—

"than anywhere else in the bottom third of the income distribution".

It continues:

"It seems highly likely that a significant proportion of this group have high living standards, but, for whatever reason, their current recorded income is quite low".

Those points clearly raise some interesting questions for further research into what is going on with that data, but it shows from an unimpeachable source that the Conservative party cannot validly draw the conclusions that they do from that data. I do not want unfairly to criticise Conservative Members, but I caution against trying to redefine the problem. I heard the shadow Secretary of State for Work and Pensions on television recently suggesting that child poverty is not about money.

The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire referred to a wide range of issues, including the report "Breakdown Britain". I do not agree with its description of what Britain is like.

Andrew Selous: "Breakthrough Britain".

Mr. Timms: I am sorry. "Breakdown Britain" is a term that I have in this context, but I do not believe that it is an accurate description of what has happened in the UK.

It is dangerous—the hon. Gentleman did not fall prey to that danger, but his party needs to be careful about it—to argue, as the shadow Secretary of State has certainly done, that the problem is not about money. That takes us back to the position of the last Conservative Government, under which child poverty doubled to the highest rate in Europe. We still have some way to go to recover from that, and tackling child poverty requires serious investment of the sort announced in the previous couple of Budgets and the pre-Budget reports. We all need to square up to that. It is fair to raise other issues and concerns about what is happening in families, but that must be in addition to addressing the financial aspects of poverty, not instead of that.

The hon. Gentleman made a point about reducing the marginal rate of benefit withdrawal, and we all understand why that is attractive, but the consequences would be either significantly greater costs and extending access to tax credits much further up the income scale—I thought that the Conservative party opposed that—or scaling the system back and leaving people a great deal worse off. There is not a straightforward solution. I do not know which view the hon. Gentleman favours. Reducing the marginal rate of benefit is attractive in theory, but there are many questions about how that could be done.

Andrew Selous: During the two minutes remaining, will the Minister respond to the issues about family stability and child poverty?

Mr. Timms: Family stability is an important contribution to the well-being of children, so the Government have invested substantially in relationship support over a long period—since 1997. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's characterisation of the Government's policy in that area. My point is that we must not use that as a way of ducking out of the big financial challenge in achieving the target that we have all acknowledged this afternoon.

I have talked about the changes that we made in the Budget, and I shall respond to the important point about child care. It was suggested during the debate that the Government's response to the Committee's report implied that having imposed a statutory duty to secure sufficient child care in the Childcare Act 2006, the Government would walk away and do nothing. I assure the House that that is not the case. The duty came into place in April and Departments are considering carefully what local authorities are producing and their sufficiency assessments. They will challenge local authorities to improve those when necessary. We are certainly not proposing to do nothing. There was some concern about that.

I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in this important debate and to make important points—

The sitting having continued for three hours, it was adjourned without Question put.

Adjourned at half past Five o'clock.